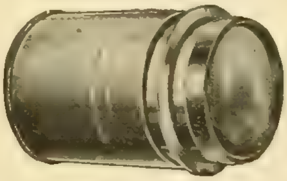
Gundlach Projection Lenses Guarantee You the Sharpest and Most Brilliant Picture it is Possible to Produce.

If you want to improve your picture just order a lens for trial subject to approval and see the result with your own eyes. If you give the height and width of the screen, the size of the picture wanted and the distance from the machine to the centre of the screen we can furnish a lens of the exact focus for your operating conditions.



Many Exhibitors have found it an advantage to ask our advice about lenses before equipping new Theatres. Do not be afraid of a long throw. No matter what the distance is to the screen we can supply lenses of suitable focus and great illuminating power. All the best theatres in Rochester use our lenses and every customer has been satisfied of their superiority to ordinary lenses. THE LENS MAKES THE PICTURE, and you cannot get the best result out of the film unless you use Gundlach Lenses.

You can order through any Film Exchange or Dealer in Motion Picture Supplies.

Gundlach Projection Lenses will be furnished to order with the following machines subject to a little higher price than ordinary lenses: Powers Cameragraph, The Motiograph, The Simplex, The American Standard, The Edison. Our Lenses are used by the Kinemacolor Co. and a large number of the finest theatres in the United States and Canada.

A Romance of Old Spain

A LOVE OF LONG AGO

This is a thrilling story of a spy who made love to a girl of the enemy and won her in the very face of the soldier of her own country. But the spy was caught and the girl tried to rescue him. There is a thrilling escape scene, a great leap for life, a dandy fight, and some dainty courting scenes. The whole reel is very romantic. Book it.

A Good Bunco Story

AN EASY MARK

Here is our best confidence story since "Spirit Hand," and it will lend much novelty to your programme. The confidence man has a certain amount of interest for all of us and his every adventure finds favor in fiction and film. See the synopsis and learn he isn't glorified in this particular picture. In fact, his practises are discouraged.

"COMING AMERICANS"

Each of these releases will be advertised to SEVEN MILLION people. You will feel the demand Prepare to meet it by insisting that your exchange buy BOTH AMERICANS. Help us to help you

"THE AGITATOR"

Western Drama. Release Thursday, April 4.
Length, 1,000 feet.

How "Buck" Cathaway, cowboy, imbibed poor whiskey and anarchy and tried to make things unpleasant on the "Big N" ranch. A stirring, inspiring Western story, full of action and poor politics.

"Checkmate and The Ranchman's Marathon"

Split Reel. Release Monday, April 8.
Length, 1,000 feet.

In "CHECKMATE" you have a highly amusing tale of how a visiting chum nearly stole the other's best girl.

"THE RANCHMAN'S MARATHON" is a rollicking, corking good comedy centering about the efforts of two clumsy ranchmen to win a girl. The real winner doesn't run—except to the church with the girl.

April 9th

"A Cure for Stage Fever"

A young college girl having been favorably written up by her home paper after an amateur performance at school is smitten with a high fever for fame before the real footlights.

PRESCRIPTION:

One handsome suitor.........................Wealthy
One theatrical manager......................Grafting
One barnstorming company...................Rotten

Mix well—take to small town and "try it on the dog"—add small attendance, with many vegetables and "home-grown" eggs—one busted box office—long walk back and the fever is reduced to a "never-again" degree in fond suitor's arms.

Facts and Comments

WILLIAM A. BRADY, the well-known theatrical promoter, is expressing his ardent sympathy for the manufacturers of motion pictures. "These men," he said before a Congressional committee, which gave a hearing on the Tonwsend Bill, are "up against it." He volunteered the opinion that the pictures are getting monotonous and tiresome and that the public are crying for something better. In conclusion he drew a picture of the large moving picture houses with big seating capacity at a loss to offer their patrons the quality demanded. He suggests that the producers buy in the same high-priced market, in which he himself has to make his purchases. A blunt word of criticism from an enemy is often worth more than the flattering estimates of friends and none will deny that the criticism of Mr. Brady is in part at least quite correct. Too many exhibitors asking for bread receive nothing but stones, and stones as a steady diet are not conducive to either health or prosperity. All this, of course, is quite apart from the question before the committee. No sound argument against the bill was offered at the hearing. Whether it passes or not, the motion picture will go on its way of progress and enlarged usefulness. Mr. Brady is looking through the magnifying glasses of self-interest, when he sees "disaster ahead." We are used to prophesies of disaster in this industry.

THERE is a lot of shallow talk about our superiority to censorship. As a matter of fact an artistic censorship, competently exercised, would benefit the industry. It would keep certain manufacturers, both domestic and foreign, away from big subjects, which they cannot handle. A dozen or more so-called features, pretendedly classic in character, are now on the market, when they would be much better in the limbo of forgotten films. These would-be classics harm not only the exhibitor, but work great injury to the competent and conscientious manufacturer, who is deprived of a subject, which he could have treated creditably. There are many great classic subjects still left for filming. If a company like the Milano undertake the cinematographic reproduction of them the result will be an honor to the industry and a profit to exhibitors. If on the other hand a cheap manufacturer with limited resources and scant knowledge essays the task, the outcome will be a more or less laughable burlesque or parody. If we had a board of competent censors on artistic capability it would be easy to squelch the cockroach element.

HOW mightily the motion picture has risen in the esteem of the public is attested by the fact that capital, which but a few years ago fought shy of the industry, is now quite willing to finance motion picture enterprises. In scores of towns, which we could name, the foremost local financiers are the owners, directly or indirectly, of the motion picture houses of good seating capacity and good repute. Other branches of the industry too are inviting investment. The progress is peculiarly noteworthy in England, where conservatism is part of the national financial creed.

WHILE theatrical magnates in this country are becoming converts to the moving picture, there is at present a fierce and relentless war being waged against the moving picture on the continent of Europe. The aggressors are owners, directors and managers of theaters. In order to understand the situation abroad it must be borne in mind that many of the larger theaters are either supported or largely subsidized by the government. The government, therefore, has a direct and tangible interest in promoting the prosperity of the theater and in antagonizing every influence which threatens that prosperity. The resources of these governments are practically boundless and their power to suppress any particular institution which harms or displeases them cannot be challenged on any constitutional ground. Fully aware of this condition of affairs, the theater owners of Austria, banded together in a powerful organization, have petitioned the government for the suppression of the moving picture houses within the empire. The government has begun its warfare by intolerant and intolerable censorship and by drastic regulations affecting the seating capacity, safety requirements, etc., of all moving picture houses. Storms and hard times are ahead for exhibitors in that part of the world. Scores of moving picture houses will be wiped out of existence and many more will be severely crippled. A similar campaign has started in Germany, and the entire industry in Central Europe will be seriously affected.

All these facts are of great importance to the American manufacturer who exports his product into the European market. It is well known that the European market has so far been a profitable one. In some instances American manufacturers have made more money on their European than on their American sales. The question occurs as to what they may be able to do to stem this tide of official disfavor. One way to do this will be the support of exhibitors' associations in the countries named. These associations are but of recent origin and their growth has been slow. Nevertheless they are a valuable nucleus of opposition to the arbitrary methods of the government. Unless a vigorous fight is made in the courts the damage to the European trade will be enormous.

THANHOUSER PICTURE NOT DENOUNCED.

There was an item printed in these columns in last week's issue, coming from St. Louis, to the effect that a St. Louis picture patron arose in his seat at the Mikado Theater and publicly denounced a Thanhouser picture entitled "The Higher, the Fewer." The patron took exception to the picture on the grounds that it was a travesty and a fling at the Catholic Church. It appears later that the Thanhouser picture of that name is an uproarious comedy dealing with a young pugilist and an aeroplane and not bearing in the remotest way on religion of any kind. So far we have not learned the real name of the picture that was denounced, but we do know that our correspondent was misinformed as to the titles.

A Martyr to Duty

JAMES PETRIE CHALMERS, the owner and editor of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD, died Wednesday morning, March 27th, at Dayton, O., while attending the State convention of Ohio exhibitors. His death was the result of an accident. It was his keen sense of duty, his loyalty and intense devotion to the cause of the exhibitor which made him leave New York, in spite of the constant pressure of work here in his office.

In his death the world at large loses a man of sterling integrity. All who knew him respected and loved him. His distinguishing traits of character were modesty and a deep sympathy with his fellowmen. We will never know one-tenth of all his acts of kindness. He was ever the friend of all who needed advice or help. No business ever was more important to him than the claims of friend or stranger in search of assistance. To those who knew him best his death is a loss which can never be made good.

The thing most sacred to him in this life was the motion picture. His every thought was given to the uplift and progress of the great invention. He had a most gentle nature, and in all his life never inflicted pain on any human being. In his defense of what he believed to be a powerful agency for the good of mankind he stood firm and immovable, but in all the years his friends have known him, he sought to prove the rights of the motion picture to the respect of the public by setting a good example of dignity and fairness and honorable dealing in THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD.

In the crushing grief of this most lamentable hour one thought of consolation remains: James P. Chalmers has not lived in vain. He has reared for himself a monument which will endure; he has erected for himself a temple of fame destined to outlast the marble of his tomb. The result of his lifework is THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD. With his spirit still among us, the men who knew and loved him best, it will urge us to follow his lofty example and continue to labor in accordance with his ideals. Plain in his speech, simple in his ways, this martyr to duty dedicated all the faculties with which Nature had endowed him to the cause of the motion picture. The best we can hope for is to attain the goal that he had staked out. Such, then, will be the policy of this paper in the future. The memory of James P. Chalmers will be an undying source of inspiration to us all.

JAMES PETRIE CHALMERS.

James Petrie Chalmers, the editor and owner of The Moving Picture World, was born in the Orkney Islands, North of Scotland, on the 8th day of February, 1866, and at an early age learned the trade of printing. When he had reached the age of 20 years he emigrated to this country. His earliest ventures in business here were in the printing line. He had for many years taken a deep and intelligent interest in amateur photography, for which he possessed rare talents. It was he who consolidated the three publications, "Camera and Darkroom," "Photo Beacon" and "American Photography" into the "American Amateur Photographer." In this work he had associated with himself such well-known writers as Frederick C. Beach, F. Dundas Todd and the late Dr. John Nichols. In March, 1907, he started the publication of The Moving Picture World, which, under his effective guidance and management, has attained its present standing.

At this date only meagre details of the fatal accident are at hand. It seems that Mr. Chalmers, while visiting with a number of exhibitors in the plant of the National Cash Register Company, at Dayton, Ohio, accidentally opened the sliding door leading to the shaft of an elevator and fell eighteen feet. He was taken to the hospital and died without regaining consciousnesss about eight hours later.

The remains were brought to New York on Friday and the funeral services were held in the mortuary chapel of Frank E. Campbell's establishment, 241 West 23rd Street, at 2:30 o'clock Sunday afternoon, March 31. Interment was made at Kensico Cemetery on the following Monday.

Deceased was unmarried and leaves a father and mother, a brother and two sisters.

Few Prominent Actors in Pictures.

English actors of rank have not yet figured upon the cinematograph films so well and so frequently as have those of other countries. This is being gradually changed, however, and there is no reason why such distinguished members of the British stage as Arthur Bouchier, Sir George Alexander, Martin Harvey, Forbes Robertson, Fred Terry, Robt. Loraine, Violet Vanburgh, Ellen Terry, Lena Ashwell and Julia Neilson should not become as popular with cinematograph audiences as they are with those who visit the ordinary theaters.

I hear in this connection that Sir Herbert Tree's production of "Macbeth" is about to be "filmed" for the cinematograph and that the fee to be paid is $20,000. Sir Herbert's "Henry VIII" has been on the cinematograph for some time. The fee seems enormous, but it must be remembered that all the scenery and fittings have to be transported to a daylight theater specially built for this business.

Pictures Aid Army Recruiting.

The use of cinematograph pictures for helping army recruiting in this country is beginning to attract attention. Enterprising commanding officers are turning their attention to the cinematograph for recruiting purposes, and inquiry shows that moving pictures are likely to be somewhat extensively used this summer to stimulate in the youth of the country an interest in camp and army life.

"In foreign countries military authorities seem much more alive to the educational value of the cinematograph than they are in this country," said a gentleman in the London office of Pathe Freres to your correspondent. "Both in France and Germany the cinematograph is largely used in the army, and we have already done a number of films for these countries. But recently we have had several inquiries from commanding officers to take scenes in camps—infantry, cyclists, cavalry, drills, and so on—and we frequently give private shows. Some short time ago, by permission of Colonel Nugent, the commander, we took a film of the Irish Guards' parade drill. We have also taken films for private customers with a view to their being exhibited in various territorial drill halls, and lectures given on them. We are waking up in this country, there is no doubt. On many occasions lately when we have taken pictures of flights of army aviators or airships, experts have come to our private exhibition theaters to study the films, and prominent aviators say that they can learn more of their mistakes, and the best way of remedying them, by watching themselves in flight than from a fortnight's practice—and, of course, without the risks. The picture of the Lebaudy airship at Aldershot, which we were fortunate enough to secure, was of considerable value in enabling the authorities to discover the cause of the accident."

S. S. HUTCHINSON ARRANGES FOR SOUTHERN PICTURES.

S. S. Hutchinson, president of the American Film Manufacturing Company, who has just returned from a Florida trip, has arranged for a series of especially beautiful scenics with settings among a number of the Southern States. The pictures promise to be not only highly interesting, but of an educational nature as well. Mr. Hutchinson has been emboldened to make the step by the instant success which greeted two recent American scenics, "Santa Catalina, Magic Isle of the Pacific" and "A Mid-Winter Trip to Los Angeles."

TRADING STAMPS A NUISANCE AT THEATERS.

The Princess Amusement Company of Louisville, Ky., has practically decided to abandon the green trading stamp plan. The company tested the idea merely as an experiment, and found that it did not pay. In Hopkins' Theater, especially, it was a drawback. With a long line of people waiting for tickets, the man at the box office was forced to drop the work in hand and dig down for trading stamps. Officers of the Princess feel that with an even break on the weather, false stimulation by means of trading stamps is unnecessary.

FOR PUSHING "CRY OF CHILDREN."

Exhibitors will get assistance aplenty from Thanhouser Company for the pushing of "The Cry of the Children," the child-labor feature. There will be two kinds of one-sheet, and a three-sheet, also heralds. The nature of the subject is such as to make it appeal to the working classes anywhere, and the "intellectuals," on the other hand, are pretty certain to be attracted by the name of Elizabeth Barrett Browning, as the author of the poem that suggested the film. The release day is Tuesday, April 30th.

MACE GREENLEAF DEAD.

Little over a week ago, Mace Greenleaf was engaged by the Lubin Manufacturing Company as a player in one of their stock companies for the making of moving pictures. Greenleaf was a handsome fellow and eminently valuable for the work. He had been with other firms in the same line, also had played under the Frohman management with James K. Hackett and other stars. Only three days of his engagement had passed when he took a cold which rapidly developed into typhoid and pneumonia. He was taken to St. Agnes Hospital, Philadelphia, and received every attention, but passed away at 2:20 a. m. Sunday morning, March 24. Mr. Greenleaf was born in Maine and the remains will be sent to his family for final interment. The Lubin firm and employees mourn the loss of a courtly gentleman.

IN MEMORIAM—MACE GREENLEAF.

Only a few days and Mace Greenleaf passed. He had just accepted a valuable engagement with the Lubin Film Company. Handsome and well proportioned, he was looked upon as a type for modern Grecian gods and the directors clamored for his service. He worked in one picture, which will soon be seen all over the country. It was a merry drama and Greenleaf was the hero. Then he took cold and in a few days typhoid pneumonia developed. The good sisters of St. Agnes tried to save the life, but the call came and in a few hours he was dead. A factory of 385 people are sorry, but the pictures are being made, though we will never again see the face of Mace Greenleaf. Keep on working, though a few hearts bleed the world must be made happy.

"I heard the voice of Jesus cry,
This worthy soul has come to me,
To rest through all eternity.
To live ye all must die."

PATHE FRERES.

Something New

By Louis Reeves Harrison

MOTHER is still unable to pay the rent in a large number of recent heartrending photo-sobs, and the promiscuous carrying off of little girls by the Indians is assuming the proportions of a national calamity, though a few thousands of them grow up with the tribes to fall-in-love-with and be-rescued by hatchet-faced cowboys with college-cut hair sapping their brows. The gun belonging to the fellow who didn't do it is still found near the corpse in lurid bloody-murder-dramas, and the cowboys led by the black-sombreroed sheriff with a tin star are, as usual, just about to hang the innocent hero when the cowgirl of ostentatious tootsies dashes to the rescue—suspense—with proof positive that murderers having an atom of common sense, to say nothing of careful training in their perilous vocation, are not in the habit of laying their weapons by the respective sides of their victims to insure their identification and subsequent capture—a fact which invariably escapes the attention of hasty hangmen all belted round with shooters, cartridges and lassos.

There are other themes. As this is an election year, "Terrible Teddy, the Trust Buster," or "Steam-Roller Bill, the Delegate's Dread," might do for a starter. The fact that twelve Supreme Court Judges, mere political appointees, have decided in a moment of aeroplane self-appreciation and overfed self-satisfaction that they outrank the elected President and Congress is rich with material for such a farce-comedy as delighted Gilbert and Sullivan. "The Modern Despot, or Thirty Years' Torture for Stealing Two Stickpins," is up to date, and almost anything new is preferable to the perennial presentations, whose stories are carefully foretold in the titles, through which we sit indulging in vain hopes for many lost hours.

Our ancestors of one or two centuries ago were restless people, fond of travel and discovery, and real Americans of to-day, whether newly-made or of Colonial families, have that progressive desire to see all there is to be seen of the world we live in, hence pictures of travel would be of live interest if selected by those who know how to perceive what is beautiful, novel or interesting as well as merely look at it, but few of this class of moving pictures are taken by men who grasp the continuity idea even if they select the best subjects. We are progressing in a lovely scene and just getting interested in its revelations when the film is cut and attention is sharply diverted to something unfit or lacking in harmony, and so we simply get a nibble of what we might fully enjoy. Otherwise, with thousand-foot reels devoted to a trip through the French Riviera, over the Maritime Alps, through the Italian Lakes, over the Swiss Alps, or through the canals of Venice, or up the ascent of Vesuvius, or through the streets of Paris, any trip that gives lovely scenery together with the characteristics of strange peoples, would serve to delight millions who cannot get away from home, and would prove educational to the little ones.

Do not forget those "little ones." Millions of parents are interested in them and in what they see at the "Movies." As I have already suggested and will point out more clearly in future issues the educational idea as applied to motion-pictures is getting a strong grip on the people, and anyone who disregards what the people want will go to the foot of the class and stay there until he gets into his marble head what the playwright means by action and reaction. Millions of children go to the picture shows and millions of parents follow them whose hearts and lives are bound up in the little ones. All that is low, vile and injurious will have to be eliminated from the small places of entertainment, and the sooner the better for the maintenance of interest among grown-up patrons. Every picture show in this counry would be crowded to overflowing if the screen program embraced what is new and attractive in science and travel as well as what is interesting and clean in history and the drama, for the American people are just what Lincoln said they were. As for the pictured stories, those well worth the telling will require two or more reels for their suitable presentation.

I am strongly in accord with Mr. Blackton's opinion—I do not pretend to say that he originated the idea, but it became the subject of more than one discussion between us—that the trend is towards grand musical drama. In another periodical ("The American Review of Reviews") it is stated that the New York Philharmonic Society is to undertake the production of famous operas on the screen with his collaboration, but our conversation related to the production of original dramas devised for the screen on a grand scale with music composed especially for them. This not only can be done, but it will be done before another year passes by. The moment that producers realize that both playwright and composer must be given recognition and the regular percentage of box-office receipts accorded both, as in stage representations, the original dramas, some of the finest the world has ever seen, will be forthcoming, and moving pictures will move up to a very high rank of artistic and profitable performance.

During the bicycle mania it was next to impossible to convince any manufacturer of the leg-propelled vehicle that it would be superseded by the autocar. He was too saturated with present success to care what happened in the long run, but the change came, and with the bigger appeal there was no decrease in the profits of either the makers or those who dealt directly with the public. Those who were progressive, who were men of broad scope and had a clear vision of future requirements of the people, went ahead on a larger scale than ever, while those who thought the ultimate had been reached either petered out in a small way, supplying a very limited demand, or lost all they had made in complete failure. I do not say that such will be the case in moving pictures, but the trend is unmistakeable.

As far as my own limited observation goes, feature plays are growing in strength as drawing attractions, and this tendency is confirmed by reports from many sources, but the movement is a cautious one except in a few instances, and the plays are either adaptations by hack writers or built on classic lines. These are doubly valuable when they are historically correct and entertaining, they are both instructive and interesting, but the big drawing cards are yet to come. They will be modern in motif, involve profound human interest of to-day, even if they are placed in historical or classic settings. I do not pretend to say what character of grand musical drama presented on the screen will sweep the country with overwhelming success, but it is safe to say that it will involve some masterly and convincing truth applying to our present or future condition or will present one or more principles that strum great chords of human sympathy.

Personally I will welcome the grand plays when they come, and I will especially enjoy the ones that help us to understand those problems of human nature which only Genius can purposely and patiently unravel, which tend to develop our ever-increasing capacity for knowledge and happiness.

A Strong Selig Drama.

"Me and Bill" Presents a Great Battle Scene—Many Daring Exploits.

AN affecting story, with a strong heart appeal, will be found in "Me and Bill," which will be released by the Selig Co. April 4th. It has been produced by the Western company and will force commendation by its many fine scenes and beautiful photography. A restful rural atmosphere prevails throughout, excepting a fierce and realistic battle scene of the Civil War, which brings sore bereavement to two lifelong friends.

Speaking of this battle scene; it is a thrilling spectacle. A dashing cavalry charge is made on the breastworks of a detachment of infantry, and through the smoke clouds can be seen the havoc wrought, by a withering fire, on the troopers. Riderless horses dash madly here and there, their riders having been propelled from their saddles as if with a mighty catapult. How these riders have been able to escape broken necks and limbs in this mock battle will puzzle the onlooker.

The climax of the skirmish is yet to come, however. We see an ammunition wagon, desperately driven, intercepted by the enemy. The driver is lashing his horses furiously, as shot and shell sing and hurtle around him. Then we see upheaving columns of smoke and the shattered wagon turn over on its side, as a shell explodes the ammunition, leaving the driver dead among the ruins. Colin Campbell, author of the scenario and producer, has certainly given us realism to the utmost in this thrilling battle scene.

There is a refinement of acting, especially in the love scenes, in this rural drama, that is very pleasing. We are so often nauseated by the lover, who clasps his sweetheart with bear-like hug, and snatches a kiss with a ferocity that makes one fear he is going to bite her head off. There is gentle wooing and tender kissing in "Me and Bill," that some of our actors in moving pictures would do well to imitate.

Sam and Bill are schoolboys and chums in the early 40's. In the opening scene we catch sight of them going to the country school, with their books under their arms. They join two little lasses on the way and, in pairs, the four children go onward.

Years pass and these boys and girls are young men and women. Their early preferences have ripened into love and they wed. Bill is blessed with a sturdy boy and Sam with a witching girl. The wife of each passes away when the children arrive at an age when they also seek life partners. They, in turn, are betrothed, to the great joy of their fathers.

Before the wedding ceremony takes place, the first gun of the Civil War is fired. Bill's son feels that the call of his country should come first, and we see him saying good bye to his dear ones and marching away to the front.

Then the days of waiting for news are hard for the folks at home to bear. One day Bill receives a newspaper with news of a great battle and a list of the dead and missing. His son's name appears among the dead, and he bows brokenly to the blow. Sam and his daughter discover him in his sorrow, and, speechless, he hands them the paper.

Learning of her loss, the bride that was to be walks away alone in her sorrow. We see her in the little flat boat, on the lake, where she and her lover had spent sweet hours of communion. She sits in it, as if helpless, gazing toward the woodland.

When the two old men seek her, they find her under the upturned boat, and we watch them as they vainly try to bring back the breath of life. The last scene shows them all alone, yet thankful that each is still left to the other. And so Sam and Bill await the final call out of the darkness.

THE NEW SUPPLY HOUSE.

Though the latest entrant into the moving picture supply field, the house of Stern, 41 East 21st Street, looks like a formidable competitor to the longer established companies in this line. A visit to their offices surprised us on account of the volume of business being handled daily. A short talk with Mr. Samuel Stern, owner and manager, was sufficient to convince us that he intends to make his establishment the center of the moving picture supply trade, specializing in posters, banners and machine parts.

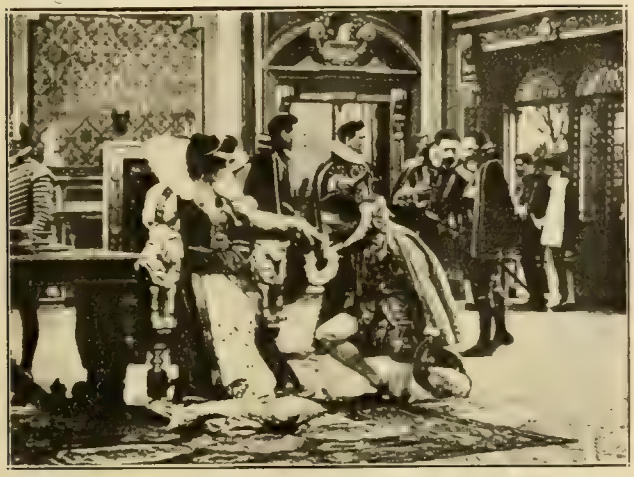
Queen Elizabeth's Ring (Cines)

Reviewed by Jas. S. McQuade.

A FINE historical subject by Cines, entitled "Queen Elizabeth's Ring," will be released by George Kleine, Saturday, April 20. The story, for the greater part, is founded on genuine historical data, although two of the principal characters are allotted names different from those given them in history, and the incident connected with the restoration of the ring to Queen Elizabeth varies from the accepted account.

The Lord Leigh, of the filmed story, is really the Earl of Essex, of history, and the Countess of Southerville is the Duchess of Nottingham, to whom Essex had entrusted the ring, given him by the Queen in a tender moment. This ring, at Elizabeth's request, was to be sent to her by the Earl when he was in jeopardy of life through the machinations of his enemies.



Scene from "Queen Elizabeth's Ring" (Cines).

After Essex's return from his futile campaign in Ireland against disaffected chiefs there, without permission from his superiors, it will be remembered that he was immediately arrested and imprisoned by his powerful enemies. Realizing that it was their intention to have him beheaded, Essex gave the ring to the Duchess of Nottingham, who visited him one day, praying her to deliver it safely to the Queen. History narrates that he met death at the block, thus showing that the ring had never reached Elizabeth.

Scene from "Queen Elizabeth's Ring" (Cines).

Years afterwards, when the aged Duchess lay dying, she sent an urgent message to the Queen beseeching her to come at once to her bedside. On Elizabeth's arrival, the Duchess confessed that she had been entrusted with the ring but that, in order to satisfy a grudge against Essex, she had retained it and allowed him to go to his death. It is said that Elizabeth became so enraged by the confession that she violently shook the dying woman, and never after fully recovered her spirits.

The filmed story shows that Lord Leigh loved Bessie, a girl far beneath him in station. This was at the time when he was a great favorite at Court and beloved by Elizabeth. This first scene shows a tender meeting between Bessie and her courtly lover on a balcony. Next we see Lord Leigh at Court, a truly magnificent interior, the decorations, furniture and costumes of the period being faithfully and artistically reproduced. The impersonations of the leading characters in this scene afford a splendid study of courtly grace and elegance. The bestowal of the ring on Lord Leigh by Elizabeth occurs in this scene.

The scene following reveals a meeting between Leigh and the Countess of Southerville, a lady-in-waiting to the Queen. It is clearly impressed on the onlooker that the Countess is in love with the Queen's favorite, and that he repels her with haughty indifference; also that her love turns into violent hatred.

Scene from "Queen Elizabeth's Ring" (Cines).

But the spurned noblewoman soon avails herself of the knowledge that Lord Leigh loves Bessie to work his ruin. She writes him an anonymous letter informing him that his love for a miserable wench will soon be made known to her Majesty. Fearing the Queen's wrath Leigh enters into a plot against her life. Meantime the Countess proves to the Queen that Lord Leigh loves Bessie.

The plot is discovered, and the conspirators are arrested and imprisoned, Lord Leigh being confined in the Tower of London. He remembers the ring and gives it to the Captain of the Guard, enjoining him to convey it to Elizabeth. Instead, the Captain delivers it to the Countess, and Lord Leigh suffers on the block.

Cunningly the Countess places the ring on a book near the Queen's chair, where Elizabeth discovers it after her favorite's death. The shock almost renders the Queen helpless, and she falls across the royal chair stunned with grief and remorse.

This film can be heartily commended for talented acting, beautiful settings and good photography. The artistic care bestowed on costumes has already been referred to.

A GREAT IMPROVEMENT IN POSTERS.

There is a great improvement in the posters that are being turned out by the Sales Company. This is a step in the right direction. The whole atmosphere of a moving picture theater is enhanced by the attractive artistic posters such as are being turned out by the Sales Company's manufacturers.

Of course the price has been raised, but this would seem to us such a welcome innovation that no one could complain of the increase in price as all concerned are bound to get it back a hundredfold in increased business.

ESSANAY COMEDIES.

The Essanay Company's comedy reputation is excellently sustained for the month of April with a great array of funny-films, eight in number. One of these is positively the biggest, screamiest Western comedy since "'Alkali' Ike's Auto." Its title is "'Alkali' Ike's Boarding House," and Augustus Carney was never funnier than in this cracker-jack. The other seven subjects are gems of their kind, clever in plot and abounding in real mirth. Watch out for May! Another rip-roaring "Alkali" Ike feature coming!

Another Feature Film Company.

It's Called the "Century" and Will Handle the Eclair Subject, "The Land of Darkness," on State Rights Plan.

JOSEPH SPERO, formerly with the W. E. Greene Exchange of Boston, and later New England representative of the World's Best Film Company, has finally got into business on his own hook and promises to introduce some new ideas into the feature film game. Mr. Spero has organized the Century Film Company, which has its headquarters at Springfield, Mass., and has secured as his first feature film the Eclair subject "The Land of Darkness." Mr. Spero declares that while this subject is an exceptionally fine one, it does not fully constitute his conception of what is needed for the proper conduct of a feature film entertainment. It is a two-reel production and one of the finest of the many feature subjects now being offered, but his ideas contemplate something more extended. He hopes eventually to demonstrate what he means, but in the meantime, promises to offer a number of real features, among which this may be considered a notable example.

"The Land of Darkness" is a drama in which a coal mine disaster provides the big scenes. It was made by the French Eclair company and a notable cast of players was engaged for the production. The principals included Cecile Guyon, of the Renaissance Theater, Paris; M. Vibert and M. Liabel, of the Post St. Martin Theater, Paris; Charles Krause, of the Sarah Bernhardt Theater, Paris.

In point of photography this must take a place among the remarkable pictures of the year. Many beautiful effects are obtained by photographing against the light and the underground scenes are startling in reality.

In the story Claire Lenoir is left an orphan and committed by her dying mother to the care of a widowed aunt who lives with her son Louis, a workman in the mines. Claire is welcomed to her new home and her cousin Louis is deeply impressed by her charms. A rival soon springs up in Charles Marcourt, a miner and a close friend of Louis. Charles is ardent in his love making and asks Claire to marry him, but she suspects that her cousin is in love with her and determines to be loyal to him and turns Charles down.

When the engagement day arrives Charles becomes despondent and leaves the feast with the intention of committing suicide. Claire suspects his intention and follows him and pleads with him to give up his purpose. Louis witnesses this and believes that Claire is unfaithful. At once jealousy springs up between the two old friends and they become bitter enemies. This enmity results in a fight in the depths of the mine. In the struggle one of the miner's lamps is broken and a terrible explosion ensues in which Charles is injured, while Louis is unhurt.

Seeing his rival wounded Louis has a change of heart and makes a desperate struggle to save his old-time friend, carrying him to a place of safety. The burden of his wounded comrade makes progress difficult over the débris of the wrecked mine and, to make matters worse, an underground lake bursts forth and fills the passageways with water, from which they gain temporary safety on a ledge in the mine, where they await rescue or death.

Above ground the news of the disaster has quickly spread to the town and soon the mine is surrounded by women and children seeking word of their loved ones. As the dead and wounded are brought out of the depths Claire and her aunt scan their faces for Louis, but he is not among them. Finally a rescue party is formed to search for the missing. It is headed by the young engineer in charge of the mine. After a long and desperate struggle the rescuers reach the entombed miners, but they arrive too late—death has claimed them. The bodies are brought out and placed in the chapel. Claire comes to mourn for her friends and finds comfort and hope for the future in the tender glances of the young engineer, who has long been her silent admirer.

Were it possible to obtain a motion picture of the interior of a coal mine under the conditions described, it is doubtful if more realistic pictures could be obtained than those shown in this picture. Most startling is the scene of the attempted rescue with the miners working desperately to reach their imprisoned comrades whose feeble tapping urges the rescuers to renewed efforts. What is happening on the other side of the barrier is dramatically pictured. Louis has succeeded in dagging his wounded friend out of reach of the water and there they await their fate. They can hear the efforts that are being made to reach them, but they are unable to help themselves. First, Charles succumbs to the effects of the poisonous vapors of the mine. Louis continues to answer the tappings which tell him of the approach of the rescuers, but he is unable to hold out and falls dying across the body of his friend just as the wall of rock is broken through. The rescue party find them lying there, united in death.

It is one of the strongest pictures of the year and should be a record breaker among the many excellent features that have been released. The Century Film Company is to be congratulated upon securing it for its first release.

Republic Players in Comedy.

Two Numbers About to be Released That Possess Merit of No Small Degree.

REPUBLIC players and directors have reason to be proud of their efforts in some of the comedies recently produced under the "Rep" trade mark. Two of these pictures, about to be released, are exceptionally good. One, "A Cure for Stage Fever," depicts the heart-breaking experience of a young lady seeking histrionic laurels; the other, entitled "A Tragic Moment," shows what might happen to an obstreperous father who objects to the matrimonial plans of his pretty but determined daughter.

In "A Cure for Stage Fever" a charming young woman delivers the ultimatum to her lover that she cannot consent to let him marry her until she has made a name for herself upon the stage. Lover gets busy at once and frames up a deal with his friend, a theatrical manager, to put out a barnstorming company at once with Miss Blank in the cast and draw on him for his trouble. Mr. Manager gets busy and soon the girl is on her way with as fine a company of "hams" as ever hit the pike.

Scene from "A Cure for Stage Fever" (Rep).

The company opens in the town hall at Stony Ridge to small cash receipts, but before the play is half over what the citizens of Stony Ridge failed to contribute in coin they made up in carrots. Next day the newspaper roasted the show and the landlord held the company's trunks for his bill. There was nothing left for the troupe to do but walk, and before long we see them hoofing it toward home painfully by way of the tie-route.

The stage struck girl keeps up her courage and tries to aid a weaker sister along, but the latter finally collapses and refuge is taken in the home of a kind farmer, who probably did not see the performance. From this haven of rest the girl tells her lover of her plight and he comes to the rescue. Not long after this harrowing episode the young lady admits that she has had all the stage experience she wants and finds a restful spot on her foxy lover's manly breast.

"A TRAGIC MOMENT" (Rep).

Almost all the changes imaginable have been rung in on the elopement idea, but every now and then someone comes along with a new curve to the ancient theme until we are inclined to believe that it is a subject inexhaustible. "A Tragic Moment" is one of the latest curves and, while one may find it a bit trying to discover just when the tragic moment occurs, there is still sufficient fun in the picture to cause you to forget the title and vote the picture a capital comedy in any event. For example, when father—who threatens to tip the scales at or near 300 avoirdupois—applies the toe of his boot to a tender spot in the rear elevation of a persistent lover, there is a moment sufficiently tragic for the requirements of almost any comedy picture. Later, when the lovers, eloping, find themselves in a wrecked wagon with father approaching by motor at sixty miles per minute—is it not also tragic?

Scene from "A Tragic Moment" (Rep).

But the real tragic moment happens when father, through a failure to consider the high cost of living, tenders an honest farmer a measly "two bits" for information that his prospective son-in-law paid the same farmer liberally to conceal; gets locked in a room for his parsimony where he is compelled to listen to a blood curdling plot to murder him in cold blood.

It is from this predicament that he is rescued some three hours later by his now son-in-law, who has managed to see the parson and returns in time to hear the plot and summons the sheriff to save father from further harm. Investigation proves, however, that it was not father, but a sick pig that was marked for the slaughter and father is released in time to bestow his belated blessing upon the happy young couple who cleverly outwitted him.

There are several good comedy situations in this picture and, as a production, it is enhanced by a prevailing snow storm which adds materially to the otherwise bleak and dreary Jersey landscape.

ESSANAY GREAT WESTERNS.

During the month of April the Essanay Company announces the release of five great Western dramatic subjects, featuring Mr. G. M. Anderson. "Broncho Billy and the Girl" is one of the greatest of the famous Broncho Billy series, while the others, "A Road Agent's Love," "Under Mexican Skies," "The Cattle King's Daughter" and "The Indian and the Child" are top-notch productions, with scenes laid in the real West and of which Mr. Anderson is the producer and author. Mr. Anderson shows his cleverness by playing the character of the "Indian" in "The Indian and the Child," and a Mexican vaquero in "Under Mexican Skies." Watch for these great subjects, Mr. Show-man, and assure your patrons of A-1 films!

Politics and Love.

An Edison Drama Dealing With Those Very Important Topics Deserves Notice—A Comedy in Lighter Vein.

IN these days when there are many political irons in the fire that are rapidly reaching the "white hot" condition, the Edison picture, "The Insurgent Senator," to be released April 16, might aptly be termed a timely picture. "Insurgency" in matters political is quite the usual and the popular thing, consequently the very title is likely to arouse some interest. That the Edison players have been successful in making plain the methods of politicians will be at once apparent to those who are but casually familiar with their tricks. The picture also indicates to what limits a politician will go to gain his point when great interests are at stake. While dwelling upon this subject the thought suggests itself that more subjects along this line would not only be in keeping with the spirit of the times, but would meet with a warm welcome by audiences surfeited with Wild West and other equally pointless subjects.

The "Insurgent Senator" was written by Bannister Merwin, and the principal characters of the cast were allotted as follows:

Senator Frank Kenwick (from the backwoods)	Augustus Phillips
John Heenan, the party boss	Charles Ogle
Heenan's Daughter	Miss Mary Fuller
E. C. Brady, a financier	Marc McDermott

If the Edison Company had searched for "types" it is doubtful if they could have unearthed a cast that would have measured up to the requirements of this subject better than that which was composed of the members of its permanent stock company. As the thinking, earnest and conscientious member from the "tall timber" possessed with the belief that he was chosen by the hand of fate to accomplish the work of legislative reform, Mr. Phillips makes up admirably for the part. Mr. Ogle, as himself, is an excellent counterpart of the "boss." Of commanding presence and stern visage, one could well fancy him in the position of the man behind the seat of power, while Marc McDermott, the versatile, is not wanting in his portrayal of the financier. For the woman in the case Miss Mary Fuller is most fascinating and carries a difficult role with becoming grace and dignity.

Scene from "The Insurgent Senator" (Edison).

Simplicity itself is the story. The financier and the boss, with the aid of the machine members of the senate, intend to pass a certain bill of iniquitous character. Kenwick, the insurgent, intends to speak against it and to show the rascals up. Something must be done to head him off. Various attempts are made to corrupt him, but they fail. Finally the social game is sprung. The senator is invited to a splendid reception and there he meets the daughter of the boss Heenan. The girl is truly beautiful and it is not to be wondered that the country senator should be attracted to her, nor does he conceal his liking for her, though it does not occur to him that the girl is being used as a bait by her unscrupulous father.

When the time for the bill to be presented for final passage arrives the girl calls at the office of the "insurgent" senator and attempts to detain him until it shall be too late for him to register his protest. In the senate chamber, as the time approaches, the conspirators are almost gleeful over the success of their plans. But the "insurgent" is not to be diverted so easily from his task. He is desperately in love with the girl and makes that fact plain to her, then he tears himself away and arrives at his place in time to speak against and to defeat the bill, after which he returns to his office to find the girl awaiting him. While he is still wondering at her presence, Heenan, the boss and the father of the girl, arrives on the scene. He is white with the anger of defeat and is prepared to say things to the "insurgent," but the presence of his daughter disconcerts him. Then, as he looks inquiringly at the girl, she calmly walks into the arms of the "insurgent," who is equal to the emergency and casts a defiant glance toward the boss as the latter takes himself slowly away from there.

It is a well acted and adequately staged production.

"THE DUMB WOOING" (Edison).

Another of Bannister Merwin's stories, this comedy, "The Dumb Wooing," would be funny if it were genuinely funny to consider physical defects of human beings in a humorous light. In this case there are two young men in love with the same girl, but one has an impediment in his speech and the other seems to be a bit nervous about the fit of his shirt band. It is just like the girl to be greatly amused over their attempts at making love. Her father cautions her not to encourage them, but the temptation is too great and, besides in the absence of a better man, a girl must flirt with something.

In the course of events the girl happens to meet what the scene title says is "a real man," being introduced to him by her two unfortunate friends. Soon after, when the girl's father discovers that the young men are still paying court to his daughter, but without ability to propose to her in coherent language, he takes them in hand and suggests that they tell the girl what is on their minds by the sign language and the one who succeeds shall have her.

Scene from "The Dumb Wooing" (Edison).

The girl overhears her father's plan and quickly forms one of her own. While the young men are receiving their instructions she gets the "real man" on the telephone and tells him what to do. The stage having been properly set for this little comedy, the young men decide which shall try first by matching coins. The successful one attempts by many gestures to convey to the girl what is in his heart. When he finishes she leads him to one side of the room and hides him behind a screen. The other is treated likewise, but just as she disposes of him the "real man" is ushered in and proceeds to make his dumb proposal. This time the girl understands the language of pantomime and accepts, while father appears in time to be properly consulted and to consent. As for the two young men, deficient physically, they discover that they are superfluous and depart in haste.

The situations in this picture are sufficiently ludicrous to cause even an unfortunate "stutterer," if he possess the sense of humor in sufficient quantity, to laugh despite his distressing infirmity.

Mention of these two pictures would not be complete if note were not taken of the excellent photography which marks each, not to forget the careful attention to detail in the settings. There has been a marked improvement in the work of the Edison studio in this latter respect during the past year.

Montgomery Company's Annual Meeting

Stockholders Receive Satisfactory Report of the Year's Business and a Large Dividend—Directors and Officers Elected.

The first annual meeting of the Montgomery Amusement Co. was held at Jacksonville, Fla., recently. There was a large attendance of stockholders and considerable enthusiasm was displayed over the result of the first year's business. This company was organized by Mr. F. T. Montgomery for the purpose of establishing and operating picture theaters. Mr. Montgomery, president, and John T. Alsop, Jr., Treasurer of the company, presented to the stockholders detailed statements and reports of the affairs of the company covering the first twelve months of its existence, all of which were certified to by an expert accountant, which showed that very large returns had been made for the stockholders on their investment and that the Montgomery Amusement Co. is in an exceedingly prosperous condition.

MR. F. T. MONTGOMERY,

Promoter and President of the Montgomery Amusement Co.

Theaters Make Good.

These reports showed large investments in Jacksonville, Atlanta, Ga.; Savannah, Ga.; Columbia, S. C.; Valdosta, Ga., and Dayton, O., in all of which cities the company is operating splendidly equipped moving picture theaters, which are unexcelled in the form of entertainment presented and are everywhere patronized by the very best citizens of the communities in which they are located.

The reports of officers showed that handsome profits have been made by every house being operated by the company since its organization.

Officers Well Pleased.

Both the president and treasurer in their addresses to the stockholders expressed great faith in the future of the Montgomery Amusement Co., and after the transaction of all business at the stockholders' meeting, upon motion of Howard E. Harkisheimer, seconded by Mayor Jordan, a resolution was unanimously passed expressing the thanks of the stockholders to the officers of the company for the successful manner in which the affairs of the company had been managed during the year just past.

Election of Officers.

The following directors were elected for the ensuing year: Frank T. Montgomery, Jacksonville; H. C. Dorsey, Savannah; John T. Alsop, Jr., Jacksonville; Howard E. Harkisheimer, Jacksonville; C. H. Barnes, Jacksonville; C. E. Buchanan, Atlanta; George E. Warner, Atlanta.

"THE MYSTERIES OF SOULS."

In "The Mysteries of Souls", avarice leads to criminal intention and a young woman is persecuted that a brace of scoundrels may become possessed of her wealth.

Frank Alberti is the guardian of Lydia, a sweet and unsuspecting young girl. By the terms of his brother's will in the event of her death he will come into possession of her property. An unnatural relative, he plots to remove her and adopts despicable methods. He is a man of some prominence and he enlists the services of one Bernard, a gambler, who is possessed of remarkable hypnotic power over weaker minds.

Alberti lays his plans craftily. He takes Lydia to the seaside and invites her to go out rowing in company with himself and a friend. Bernard is disguised as a boatman and rows them to sea. The dory has been tampered with and sinks. As the boat fills with water Alberti and his friend swim for it and leave Lydia struggling in the water. The scene is an astonishing one. The girl is seen to sink down, far below the surface, and then rise again. Bernard conceives a cunning plan and dives and rescues the girl that he may extort money from Alberti. He swims with her to safety unknown to his accomplice.

Scene from "The Mysteries of Souls."
(Released by Great Northern Feature Film Co.)

Lydia is reported drowned and Alberti makes a pretense of mourning her death while enjoying his sudden acquisition to wealth. He pays Bernard a sum of money agreed upon and breaks with him. Bernard takes Lydia to Vienna. She is subjected to his hypnotic influence and meekly obeys his every will. Bernard is accompanied on his flight by Fritz, his faithful tool, and the pair meet a young Englishman, Vernon, and invite him to their gaming table. They play for heavy stakes and the young man wins. Having lost his money, Bernard resolves to get Vernon in his power. Acting under his direction Lydia induces Vernon to drink of drugged wine and he is made unconscious, while Bernard, partially concealed, directs her movements. Bernard repairs to the gambling room and becomes involved in a quarrel. He receives a blow which stuns him and he is rendered unconscious, and his influence over Lydia vanishes. She recovers her faculties with a start and is bewildered. Recovering her composure she arouses Vernon, who makes his escape from the window by means of a rope, improvised by using curtains.

Lydia is about to follow when Bernard regains consciousness. He returns to Lydia and his shadowy form is seen and, after a brief struggle, she once more succumbs to his influence. Vernon staggers along the street, gradually awakening to the horrors of the situation. He secures assistance and returns to raid the gambling house and rescue Lydia. Bernard and Fritz make good their escape by means of a secret underground passage, through which they intended to convey the body of the girl. Lydia can give no information to the officers as she is still in a dazed condition.

Bernard telegraphs Alberti for money, making the demand peremptory and Alberti responds in person. Vernon sees the precious scoundrels at the railway station and follows them to an inn to call the police. In the inn a heated argument takes place between Alberti and Bernard, but Alberti is forced to give Bernard a large sum of money. Just as Bernard is counting the money the police break in upon them. There is a short but decisive duel with pistols and Bernard is killed and Lydia recovers her faculties. She comes to the room where Alberti is being questioned by the officers and appears to Alberti. He believes her to be a ghost of his ward and, in his terror, expires.

Later we see Lydia and Vernon at the seaside, happy, and the inference is that they are bethrothed—a happy culmination of a tragic story.

This subject will be distributed by the Great Northern Special Feature Film Company on the State rights plan.

Purgatory and Paradise.

A New Four-Reel Subject From Dante's Divina Commedia Secured by Superior Feature Film Co. of New York.

BEFORE the "Inferno" of Dante was done in moving pictures, the comparative number of average citizens who knew their Dante was very small. Most people had a vague knowledge of him. His name and that of his great poem had been heard of by nearly everybody, but the great mass of people either had no time to read him or did not advance far enough in their school careers to come to the study of Dante. However, since the immortal work of Dante was made into a moving picture, the poet is better known and understood. Previously his works had lain upon dusty shelves, to be looked over at times by Dante scholars who, of course, were almost as rare as the volumes of Dante. But now all this is changed. The moving pictures of Dante's "Inferno" have created a demand for the printed work at the booksellers and at the public libraries. Men have returned to their homes after seeing an exhibition of the pictures with the full intention of reading Dante, which intention has no doubt been fulfilled in most instances.

When this new crop of Dante students has finished reading the great epic poem, it is reasonably certain that they will be glad of an opportunity to see more of it in pictures. In reading the work they will realize that the Inferno dealt with only a part of the divine comedy. Having seen Hell pictured in such a vivid way, and according to the work of Dante, it is more than probable that these new converts would like to see a continuation of it in moving pictures, namely the reproduction of "Purgatory," which is the second book of the poem, and, "Paradise," which is the third and last. It was only a question of time before these latter two books would be forthcoming, and it is the duty of this paper to record, as a matter of news, that these subjects have arrived in America in the form of motion pictures, consisting of "Purgatory" in two reels and "Paradise" in two reels. These two subjects were seen in their entirety during this week by a representative of the World at the offices of the Superior Feature Film Company, 32 Union Square, New York City, which company has bought the American rights.

As near as can be ascertained, the films are of the Helios make, which is an Italian firm doing more or less of a business in feature film manufacture. The "Purgatory" is somewhat similar in treatment to the regular version of the Inferno, that has been going the rounds during the past six months. But "Paradise" is totally different from either of them. Of the latter we can say that nothing like it has been seen before in these parts. It is done in a way that defies imitation and will probably stand in a class by iself for always.

At the beginning of "Purgatory" we see Dante and Virgil leaving the shades of the lower regions. Their progress there had become dangerous, wherefore Beatrice, the patron saint of Dante, descends, at the opening of the second book, and creates for them a safe passage into Purgatory. Purgatory differs vastly, as most everybody knows, from the Inferno. It differs also from Paradise in the same proportion. It is not such a dreadful place as Hell and is by no means such a pleasant place as Paradise, therefore it will be easy to comprehend that Purgatory describes a condition somewhere between Heaven and Hell. According to the general understanding, Purgatory is a preparatory or a limbo where penances are to be done by those who are eventually to be admitted into Paradise. Those souls that have been condemned to the Inferno are lost forever, but those spirits which we see in Purgatory have hope vouchsafed to them, and eventually theirs is to be the Celestial joy.

Dante and Virgil pass from sphere to sphere in the Purgatory, and while there accost numerous spirits known to the author of the divine comedy. The scenes are exquisite in many instances. Several of them are imposing in the extreme and are superior in comparison to some of the scenes of the Milano version of Dante's Inferno. The subject of Purgatory in itself is more pleasing than that of the Inferno, being devoid of all the gruesome and revolting punishments recorded by Dante in his first book. Purgatory inclines more to sympathetic meetings between Dante and more favored souls than those who are left behind in the darker regions. Many of these spirits are those who met with violent deaths, cut down before their time with all their imperfections on their heads. Many also are confined in the limbo who lived and died before the coming of Christ and who therefore are not held sinners in the sight of God, but must remain in limbo until the day of judgment before their status is definitely determined. The Purgatory pictures flash back frequently to scenes upon earth for the purpose of telling an anecdote pertaining to the life of one of the spirits, to illustrate the story which the spirit is relating to Dante at the time. These spirits and anecdotes belong, of course, to certain definite periods of Italian history which cannot be dealt with at this time. But such as there are of them are fairly well done.

In the scenes of Paradise there is a most radical change; so much of a change, in fact, that we can scarcely credit the Paradise picture as having been made by the same producer that directed the Purgatory picture. This may be explained in a measure by remembering that in producing such a work as the Purgatory the director is enabled to use scenes of earth as very suitable backgrounds, but in a reproduction of Heaven, the scenes call for that which is not of the earth. The work calls for studio finesse of the highest order, plus imagination without limit. Any pictured version of Heaven is one which might cause the ablest producer to pause and consider the overwhelming magnitude of such a task. But the producers of this picture have faced their task with boldness that must be admired. Feeling sure of their ability they have gone ahead in no uncertain manner in giving us glimpses of Heaven, which are far different from any imaginings we may have had on the subject. 'Mid rolling clouds we see the divine Beatrice welcome Dante to the realm of perpetual joy, and, under her tender guidance, to him is revealed the great glory of the hereafter. It would be impossible to describe in detail the many changing glimpses that we are accorded of this delightful place of abode. Needless to say the manufacturers have spared themselves no pains and have successfully rendered visual pictures from Dante's inspired description.

By way of criticism we might say that the subtitles were not of sufficient number to be fully explanatory, and if the picture is to make any great success with the public it will be quite necessary to have a lecturer to carry along the story. The pictures adhere very closely to the words and ideas of Dante and there should be some one present to call attention to the minute points lest they be lost sight of in the frequent changes of scene.

IOWA TRUST LAW DRASTIC.

Writing from Oskaloosa, Iowa, C. S. Longshore, manager of the White Slave Company for Iowa, directs the attention of the Moving Picture World to the laws of that State governing so-called trusts or trade combinations and notes its peculiar effect upon a proposed combination of picture theaters in Oskaloosa. That city has a population of 10,000 and five picture theaters are in operation there. It is stated that the managers of four of these houses have formed a combination for the betterment of the business with one definite object in view: that of purchasing the lease of the fifth house and closing it permanently. The length of the shows has been decreased in three houses and the fourth has increased its price of admission.

These circumstances have been brought to the attention of the county attorney, who intimates that he may have to prosecute the managers of these theaters under the State law which prohibits combinations intended to limit trade in any manner. The penalty in that State for such violations is a fine of not less than $500 or more than $5,000, with a year's imprisonment or both. In this case it is quite likely that picture theater managers and picture exchanges in Iowa will be careful regarding the combinations they make.

PHILIP TO RUN VICTORIA PARK, BERLIN, ONT.

George O. Philip, manager of the Philip Amusement Company, which operates picture theaters at Berlin, London and Chatham, Ontario, will have charge of Victoria Park at Berlin this coming season. He promises many improvements.

The Moving Picture Educator

THE LATEST PRACTICAL ADVANCE IN SCHOOL CINEMATOGRAPHY.

Under the auspices of the Motion Pictures' Parents' Association of the Manhattan Public School No. 10, the West End Theater has been engaged for a purely educational exhibition on the afternoon of March 9. A nominal charge of admission is made as a profit is desired. The Parents' Association has engaged this theater and is giving this exhibit in order that they may raise money to purchase a moxing picture machine and have a booth erected in the school that will comply with all the laws of the Building and Fire Departments, so that they will be able to hold educational picture exhibits for their classes each week.

This is probably the first direct move toward actual school and class moving picture work. This particular school is one of the largest in New York City and will probably rank as the leader in real practical educational cinematography. Madame Dolesé, of the General Film Company, is giving the enterprise the benefit of her knowledge and experience. Under such guidance there can be no doubt about the successful outcome of this venture.

The films sohwn on this occasion are "The Panama Canal in 1911," "The Declaration of Independence," "Sea Birds in Their Haunts," "Birds in Their Nests," "The Fly Pest," "The Carrot Caterpillar," "April Fool," and "The New Church Carpet." To those familiar with these subjects it will be seen that they are instructive in the highest degree, and also entertaining, with a little addition of intelligent amusement. There is no doubt the example of this school will be followed in many places and the moving picture educator will be glad to be made acquainted with all such enterprises.

In Newark, N. J., Assistant Superintendent Carson is giving a course of lectures covering a whole week, and adapted to the different classes. He is using the films above mentioned with the addition of such as "Boil Your Water," "From the Egg to the Spit," and "The Fly Pest." To those who are interested it should be made plain that the General Film Company has a large list of subjects suitable for a broadening of this work and are willing to lend every assistance wherever needed. The "Educator" also is ready and anxious to assist all inquirers.

"A PERFECT STUDY OF THE FLY" (Eclair).

One of the best and most useful pictures last year was that showing the ravages of the common housefly. It proved acceptable everywhere, being formally adopted as a means of meeting a possible danger, from the power which this insect possesses to carry disease.

It was, however, simply an illustration of one phase of its unfortunate characteristics.

In a new film shortly to be released by the Eclair, a study of the fly is as near perfection as possible, especially if thoroughness and completeness are essential to perfection, for these qualities are to be found in this excellent film.

Beginning at its earliest possible development it is shown that:

No. 1.—This dangerous little creature is quick to discover any unclean thing which will favor the development of its numerous progeny.

A dead rat is the most unclean if not positively repulsive thing upon which the fly is seen feeding and preparing to make a home.

No. 2.—The grown fly, in searches for a favorable place, creeps under the cadaver and there lays its eggs.

Underneath this rat the flies proceed to establish themselves and under the obnoxious conditions of the increasing corruption of this animal there comes to life that progeny which cannot but be as corrupt as its environment as well as on what it feeds.

No. 3.—The larva, which soon generates into life, has the strange faculty of liquefying that which will become its nourishment.

It is exceedingly interesting to watch the development of the larva and watch the glutenous nature into which it seems to form before taking the separate and distinct shape known as the maggot.

No. 4.—They progress by crawling movements, by the aid of little hooks about the mouth, while at the other extremitity the respiratory cord is to be found.

Here the microscope has done splendid work to aid this study. The head and mouth of this minute creature appear like those of a small hippopotamus, so that a most perfect exhibition of its power to feed upon the microbes so infinitesimal can readily be understood.

No. 5.—Popularly termed maggots, they now leave the corpse and bury themselves for the transformation into flies.

The metamorphosis here is equally as interesting and as wonderful as the butterfly, even if not so beautiful; its unclean conditions making attractiveness out of the question.

No. 6.—A few weeks later the fly breaks through its shell, its wings being still closed.

The full-bodied fly now appears and the enlargement certainly reveals it as a marvel of delicate construction, making one wish that its life were not so undesirable, for it is indeed a marvel of creation, even if it is only created to be destroyed as a teacher of cleanliness.

No. 7.—The delicate little wing of a housefly.

The silky, transparent beauty of the wing is presented as a study in itself. Like its associates in insect life, it seems that the smaller and more intricate the structure the more marvelous does it appear under the microscope, and their relative strength enormous.

No. 8.—The feet and the trunk are two factors for transmitting microbes.

The disease carriers are here plainly seen, so that it no longer becomes a wonder to anyone that they are as capable as they have proved to be. Now they are swarming in evident enjoyment upon the luxury of the putrid body of the rodent.

No. 9.—These repugnant insects, after having feasted on filthy and decayed objects, are allowed to enter the house and spread disease and death.

In the house these same flies are now seen upon the surface of a cake or tart where they are disporting thmselves and depositing whatever filth, germs or disease they have extracted from their last filthy feeding place. Finally a beautiful, bright, innocent and happy-faced child is seen eating the cake as with all the relish of absolute purity. The last picture is enough to make anyone an enemy of this pestiferous insect, so mighty in its dangers. This film will be a great teacher wherever it is shown. Its interest-holding power is intense, its lessons will be indelibly impressed on the mind, and its object will be fully realized by thousands who will be thankful for the film.

NOTES ON PICTURES OF INTEREST.

"One Thousand Miles Through the Rockies" (Edison).—This is a most excellent film; it is even superior to taking the actual trip because the camera catches scenes impossible to the keenest observation of the traveler. As a lesson in geography it is most excellent; as descriptive of scenic beauty it is thrilling. One interested in educational themes cannot help wishing for a whole series of this class of pictures; we are certainly not getting enough of them. Coming by sections and mixing them with an indiscriminate program is not doing them justice. A complete series with a lecture would form a most intelligent course, and before long the films would be found in every high school in the world.

The ever popular weekly illustrated (Pathe's) continues to hold its interest. The fact that nearly every week produces scenes of railroad wrecks, would seem to suggest that it is high time some government commission were appointed to make thorough inquiry into the too frequent occurrence of these calamities. If the "weekly" can bring about such a commission it will render a great public service. In the picture of the destruction of a theater in Germany, it was most astonishing to note that the fire engines in use are the old fashioned pumping engines with four or six men on each side. It is indeed strange that in progressive Germany there is still in use an engine that is now two generations in the rear. A very interesting contrast is shown in the picture of sled-coasting on the snow in Switzerland and water coasting on banana leaves in Indo-China. Both are invigorating sports, the one in extreme cold and the other in extreme heat. Coasting on a large leaf down a graded shallow waterfall into the pool at the foot of the descent, "shoot the chutes" fashion, is a method of bathing which would become very popular in this country. The pictures of the great devastation wrought by the severe hurricanes which have visited several parts of the country seem to reveal a reason for so much damage. Judging from the appearance of the débris, there is little doubt that the buildings were of the flimsiest possible kind and suggest the lack of a building inspection. The pictures are useful in showing that weakness of construction is more blamable than strength of storm.

Ladies always welcome and appreciate the latest fashion showing, making a veritable feminine post-script to every issue of the Weekly.

Comment was made recently on this page of the rapid progress possible to the "Man of the Future;" it was not, however, anticipated that he was so near. A military aviator recently took a short trip in an aeroplane; descending, he was carried in an automobile to the wharf where a submarine boat was waiting in which he descended to the depths of the sea. This three-fold change taking place within fifteen minutes—the most wonderful fifteen minutes on record—marking the acme of modern science. Wonderful as was this feat, it was, however, deprived of the full value of its greatest possibility in that a cinematograph record was not taken of the events; had the eye of the living camera only been focussed on this intrepid traveler perfection would have been reached—the moving picture was lacking for absolute completion.

County fairs or interstate agricultural exhibitions will prove interesting to city people as they are pleasing to the urban or suburban population, while racing events are too "birdseye" in character; they suffice to give a general idea of such occasions. While detail or enlarged portraits of the "blue ribbon" animals in every class serve the double purpose of an exhibition and a lesson in natural history, the best specimens of any class of beings, animate or inanimate, are always of value in cultivating a knowledge of the superior in life.

BIG FILM DEALS IN THE AIR.

There is a persistent rumor that the Aitkin interests are seeking to purchase several of the largest manufacturing concerns affiliated with the Sales Company. All information on the subject is being withheld at present, but definite details may be expected within the next week or so.

BIG FILM MEETING IN CHICAGO.

Notice was issued last week by a committee of Independent picture men of Chicago, calling a meeting of exchanges and manufacturers to be held in that city at 1 o'clock Saturday afternoon, March 30. The call did not state the object of the meeting, but it is believed that a general discussion of conditions was had.

A HEAVYWEIGHT CAST.

Pierce Kingsley, one of the producers of the Republic Company, has compiled a curious statement regarding the cast of players in the picture "A Severe Lesson," which was written and staged by him. By a canvass of his players he deduces the facts that the combined weights total 2,699 pounds and that, if stood on end, they would form a pyramid 75 feet and 70 inches high. There were 14 people in the cast. Roy Applegate holds the record for weight and height, being six feet and two inches tall and weighing 252 pounds.

JOE, THE TRAIN-WRECKER.

Brooklyn, N. Y., March 15.

SIX HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLAR PICTURE PALACE.

P. Pichardo Declares That He Will Spend That Amount On An Exclusive Picture Theater in New York.

If the plans of Mr. P. Pichardo do not miscarry, New York will have, not later than next fall, the biggest, finest and most ornate theater for the exclusive exhibition of moving pictures in the world. According to the plans and specifications shown to the Moving Picture World, this picture house of Mr. Pichardo's will eclipse anything that has ever been built in this or any other country in the theatrical line, with the possible exception of one or two national theaters in Latin America.

The decorative plan is a veritable dream of an artist and Mr. Pichardo promises that it will be carried out to the least detail. "I intend to spend at least $150,000 on the lobby alone," he declared, when the question of cost was mentioned. "I will spend $600,000 and more, if necessary, to carry out my plan."

We, of the Moving Picture World, have long been agitating for a picture theater that would do justice to this city and give an adequate presentation to the best pictures, but that anyone would be sanguine enough to spend anything like half a million on such a theater was beyond our wildest dreams. Yet here comes Mr. Pichardo with seemingly unlimited treasure which he proposes to pour out without stint to attain that very object. It is almost unbelievable, yet Mr. Pichardo says he will do it; that he has the money; that he has the site, and that he will soon begin to make the dirt fly. It is to be located on 116th Street.

According to the plans the Palace Theater (that's the name of the new house) will seat 1,750. Its equipment will be of the very finest throughout, calculated to attract the highest class of patronage. The prices of admission will be 50 cents and 25 cents, according to the location of seats; special boxes and loges for parties will be arranged and everything about the house will be conducted in the best form.

The program of entertainment will consist of pictures, with proper orchestral accompaniment. With the pictures will be given an occasional musical number rendered by the best vocal and instrumental artists obtainable.

Who is Mr. Pichardo? Wait; we'll tell you at another time, but he talks like a man who knows the picture and the amusement business backwards.

"THE ROOT OF EVIL."

One of the best Biograph releases this month is "The Root of Evil," an absorbing drama of modern life, with life-like characters. The play gives scope to fine acting and this has been procured by the makers of the film. The following is the essence of the picture: The daughter of a wealthy man has secretly married his secretary. Her father's confidential adviser is an unscrupulous schemer who planned to marry the girl for her money, but on finding out the secret of the young couple seeks vengeance and makes known his discovery to the father. The father is urged to extreme measures, which result in his disowning his daughter, and making a new will in favor of the schemer.

A fine bit of scene contrast is next shown; we are in the new home of the young couple after a lapse of about five years. The husband contracts a disease which proves fatal, and leaves his wife a widowed mother of a small child. Meanwhile, the schemer has fastened his grip on the old man. A visit of the daughter excites the father, who falls dangerously ill from the shock.

The old family servant feels that this is the time for a reconciliation and, after a well-acted monologue, goes out to bring the daughter. The schemer now fears for his legacy and drops poison into the old man's medicine in order that his death may take place before the daughter returns. We are all sure that his act would have been successful had not the little granddaughter noticed it, and by imitating him, poisoned the schemer's own drink. The old man is prevented from drinking the poison and the family become happily united.

Often when a film is about half run through we can guess at how it is going to end and, in doing so, lose interest. "The Root of Evil," however, is absorbing, for we are not able to foretell its closing scene in spite of the fact that we at once see that "The Root of Evil" is money.

The film is very well staged and acted, and has just enough of the "thrill" to please the most critical audiences.

CAPT. SCOTT SOUTH POLE PICTURES.

The Gaumont Company announces that it has disposed of the American rights for the Captain Scott South Pole Expedition pictures to the Selig Feature Film Company, the headquarters of which are at Congress Avenue, Flushing, N. Y.

Music for the Picture

SUGGESTIONS FOR PIANISTS.

CONSCIENTIOUS and thorough planning of one's music is necessary to the best picture playing. An unplanned program may prove satisfactory, for in this work the same as in anything else there are those for whom the rules do not apply; but the average pianist can do no better than to plan his music. There are in every picture a few situations which stand out above all others in importance. These should be singled out for special treatment. The public, always ready to detect incongruities between music and picture, will forgive small errors of judgment if leading situations are played to skillfully.

To illustrate this point consider the Biograph subject, "A String of Pearls." The story begins happily with faint suggestions of romance, for which the music should be graceful and pretty on the order of Massenet's "Aragonaise" (Century edition). Then of a sudden there is a drop. The young man comes home ill, to all appearances the victim of tuberculosis. Despair is in every heart, the future looks forlorn indeed. This the music must reflect and at the same time transform and make sweet. Kate Vaunali's "Goodbye, Sweet Day" has all the qualities for this purpose. Then later when the gorgeous social function is on at the millionaire's home, some brilliant piece like Gottschalk's concert valse "Radieuse" is necessary. Soon the invalid returns well and happy while the millionaire's wife in striking contrast falls ill and dies. These two situations will bear the most varied treatment. Perhaps the best that can be done is to play the lively "Flower Song" from Faust for the one and "Ase's Death" (Grieg) for the other. Of course more music will be needed for the picture than just what is named here. The point the writer wishes to make, though, is that a great deal will have been done towards a musical interpretation if a few important situations such as these are properly handled.

How well people like the old tunes! This was forcibly illustrated in playing for Kalem's "A Spartan Mother." A song like "Old Folks at Home" with variations can still make a very good impression. In one part of the picture the Union army is seen driving the Confederates from the field. Carlos Tryor's paraphrase of the "Star Spangled Banner" will sound magnificently here; then without modulating into another key and with the same variations the pianist can play "Dixie" as the Confederates regain their ground under the lead of the panic-stricken youth. The piano should actually roar in these battle scenes.

Lubin's "A Mexican Courtship" requires quite a number of Mexican and Spanish pieces. There are several lively Spanish airs in the "Rose of Panama," a musical comedy that recently held the boards in New York. "Senora" waltzes by Nathan are old, but they have a good swing. Neither should we despise the "Toreador" song from "Carmen." It is good to close the picture with "Gypsy Love Song" from the "Fortune Teller." A most beautiful effect can be obtained by playing this song in the higher register of the piano entirely with arpeggios. C. K. AIKEN, 56 Toledo St., Adrian, Mich.

PLAYING FOR PICTURES.

The lively interest in the character of music to be used with pictures is surely a herald of progress. The writer has recently visited picture shows in four different states, and in many—yes, most places—found that the idea that it made much difference what was played did not seem to have entered the pianist's mined.

How often was the pleasure of seeing a stately military picture marred by the playing of a waltz or a ragtime; or the picture of some pathetic scene, by "Steamboat Bill," and other innumerable incongruities!

The music may—nay, should always—be in accord with the spirit of the picture. Some are doing this in a most commendable manner, and these are the ones in demand by all wideawake managers. True, the player who does this has a great and valuable work before him and will receive credit more and more as people awaken to the difference between playing in harmony with the picture or in discord with it.

Let us not "censure him for so wasting his genius in a picture theater," but give him a cheer and let the world know that we consider the picture theater deserves the best that can be had. EMMAH WILLIAMS.

MUSIC FOR "MADAME ROLAND."

By Maurice Komroff.

1. Introduction, "The Marseillaise" (very softly).
2. Simple and light, like "La Fille du Régiment," by D. Krug, Op. 114, No. 22; or "The Wild Rose," by Ed. Mac Dowell, till scene shifts to the hall of the legislature.
3. Something agitated, reaching a climax, like the second movement of Rachmaninoff's C Sharp Minor Prelude, or Lasson's Crescendo. Play this till Viard brings the charges against Roland and his wife.
4. Dramatic, softly till the arrest of Madame Roland, and louder as she defends herself. For this use the first and third parts of Rachmaninoff's C Sharp Minor Prelude, or Chopin's Polonaise, Op. 40, No. 1. Play very softly just before her acquittal is announced, but resume previous tempo as soon as she is free.
5. Sadly—as she is arrested again. Any slow waltz may be played. Lincke's "Unrequited Love," or Cohan's "Yankee Prince" waltz are both good. This may be played while she is taken to prison, and continued till after she waves her friends farewell.
6. Funeral march—as Madame Roland is driven through the streets and mounts the guillotine. Chopin's Funeral March, Op. 35; is perhaps the best for this.
7. "The Marseillaise"—as Madame Roland looks towards Liberty and cries, "Oh, Liberty! What crimes are committed in thy name!"

PLAYED PIANO FOR 64 CONTINUOUS HOURS.

Miss Nettie M. Hubbell, of Bridgeport, Conn., recently accomplished the unheard of feat of playing a piano continuously for 64 hours, breaking all known records in that line of endeavor and winning the championship of the world from J. M. Waterbury, who claimed that distinction. Miss Hubbell is the regular piano player for the Lenox Theater of Bridgeport, owned by R. F. Kinder. Waterbury plays for the pictures at the Lincoln Theater in the same town and claimed to be the best long-distance ivory tickeler, with a record of thirty hours continuous performance. Mr. Kinder tried out his player on different occasions and found her good for thirty hours without an effort; then a contest was arranged between Miss Hubbell and Waterbury which commenced on Monday, March 11, at noon, and continued without a break until four o'clock Thursday morning when Mr. Kinder brought the test to a close. But Waterbury had quit the contest four hours before and cheerfully acknowledged Miss Hubbell the winner.

Commenting upon the contest, the Bridgeport papers declared that Miss Hubbell gave an intelligent and pleasing performance throughout the entire contest, while Waterbury frequently rested for a few moments at a time and during most of the time did little more than drum on his instrument. Miss Hubbell never left her seat during the entire performance and what nourishment she took was fed to her without interfering with her playing. Thousands of people passed in and out of the theater during the contest, which attracted great attention throughout the city and surrounding towns.

Miss Hubbell is an attractive young woman of splendid proportions and looks equal to the unusual task she accomplished. She is very enthusiastic over her achievement and is anxious to enter another contest of endurance if she can find anyone, man or woman, who will accept a challenge. She is confident that she can beat her best record of 64 hours easily.

Ohio Convention at Dayton.

Second Convention of Buckeye Managers Shows Vast Gains in Members—Exhibitors from Many Other States Attend

THE second convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Ohio, was held at Dayton, Tuesday and Wednesday, March 27th and 28th. The Ohio League is affiliated with the National League of Motion Picture Exhibitors, of which organization it is really the parent. The Dayton convention, although a state affair, was national in character, there being present exhibitors from many other states. The citizens of Dayton had made elaborate preparations for the reception of the moving picture men, an art in which they are known to excel. The first trains from New York, Pittsburgh and Chicago brought hundreds of delegates who crowded the busy thoroughfares of the city. The largest delegation was that from Cincinnati, which arrived in a special car accompanied by a brass band of thirty pieces. Ex-Senator Joseph B. Foraker, who had expected to be with the Cincinnati delegation, was detained at home on account of illness. The animated weekly photographers were on the scene as the delegates stepped from the trains. Cameramen for Pathe's Weekly and the Sales Company Weekly were stationed at points of vantage. The streets were nicely decorated and the people of Dayton went out of their way to give the visiting picture men a sincere welcome. Assembling at the C. H. & D. Railway Station, the visiting delegates marched through the principal streets of Dayton to the handsome Majestic Theater, where a meeting was at once called to order.

Mr. R. E. Alexander, chairman of the Entertainment Committee appointed by the Dayton Chamber of Commerce to welcome the delegates, was a very busy man. He estimated that more than five hundred members with their wives and families were present and more expected later.

The opening speech on Tuesday morning was delivered by President M. A. Neff, of Cincinnati, who described at length how moving pictures are elevating and educating the world. He vehemently declared that exhibitors who are not members of the League are its bitterest enemies. His speech as a whole was a glorious vindication of the moving picture from the many irresponsible charges that have been brought against it.

The motion picture men were then welcomed to the city through an address delivered by Mayor Phillips. The general tenor of the Mayor's address was such as to impress the delegates that they were recognized by the citizens of Dayton as representatives of a great and reputable industry. They were greeted as substantial business men engaged in a work that is well worth while. The Mayor spoke further at length in generous commendation of the moving picture and officially recognized it as the most potent institution embodying the highest of educational powers combined with qualities of entertainment ever known.

The assembly then devoted its attention to the matter of a national censorship board. It was recommended by the body that such a board be appointed by Congress or the President or that a law be passed in each state authorizing the Governor to appoint a censorship board. The assemblage went on record as being strenuously opposed to Police Departments being authorized as censors of artistic and moral pictures, and emphasized their belief that exhibitors should be consulted in these matters.

For the afternoon the visiting members were invited by the National Cash Register Company to inspect the workings of their mighty plant, and to witness a moving picture and vaudeville entertainment that had been arranged for their entertainment. It was at this place that Mr. J. P. Chalmers, editor and proprietor of this paper, meet his untimely death. There were two similar doors in the hallway, the upper portions of which were of ground glass. One of them was the entrance to the exhibition room and the other was the doorway to an elevator shaft. The exhibition room was dark within and the light of the projection machine could be seen through the glass of either door. Being accustomed to entering dark projection rooms, Mr. Chalmers opened the elevator door and stepped within.

The next Convention of Ohio exhibitors will probably be held at Toledo. The Toledo delegation made a strong bid for the honor and appearances indicate that they will receive the award. Much important business was transacted during the two days of the meeting and by Wednesday night the film moguls were preparing to depart. It can be said that matters are brighter for exhibitors at this time as ever before, as regards trade organization. The scheme is developing amazingly. Through successive conventions, exhibitors in various cities have come to know each other and their common interests make them kin forthwith. Through the general distribution of helpful information much has been accomplished. The momentum of the movement is great, and with a general co-operation of all exhibitors, from this time on, the exhibiting business as a reputable branch of trade will be universally recognized.

Complete details of the entire two days of the Convention have not reached this office at our time of going to press. They will be given in full in our next issue.

Mutual Film Corporation

New Factor in the Motion Picture Field Is Not a Manufacturing Proposition—To Carry On an Exchange Business Only.

On account of the erroneous statements published regarding the objects of the Mutual Film Corporation, the Moving Picture World is authorized by its promoters to make the statement that the new factor in the motion picture business is not, nor will it become at any future time, interested in the manufacture of pictures as has been said. In discussing the matter with a representative of the Moving Picture World, Mr. H. E. Aitkin, one of the promoters, said:

"You may say that the Mutual is not interested in the manufacture of pictures, nor will it be; it is an exchange proposition only and to that end a number of existing exchanges have been bought and more are under our option. I am not at liberty to tell you which exchanges these are at present, but that will be announced later.

"Our capital is $2,500,000, divided into preferred and common stock, all of which is participating stock entitled to a vote. There is $1,250,000 in common and the balance preferred.

"There is no conection between the action of the Majestic Film Corporation in withdrawing from the Sales Company and the Mutual project; that is entirely distinct and relates only to the Majestic Company. In that connection I might say that the Majestic withdrew from the Sales Company because its owners believed they were the victims of extortionate practices and that discrimination and restraint of trade was practiced against them. Acting upon that belief, the officers of the Majestic Company have caused suit to be commenced against the Sales Company and its directors; but that is another matter.

"For the Mutual exchanges I wish to say that they will work in harmony with the Sales Company and handle the product of all manufacturers affiliated with that organization. We realize that there is too much at stake to cause a serious break in the Independent ranks at this time. Our purpose is to place the exchange business upon a more logical and businesslike basis. In some respects we will follow the plan of the General Film Company. It is our purpose to utilize the best features of that organization.

"I might also say," continued Mr. Aitkin, "that nearly all the men interested in our exchanges are those who created the exchanges now composing the General Film Company. It is too soon to announce the names of the officers of the Mutual, and we are not quite ready for very much publicity of any kind just yet."

"Then there is no truth in the statement that the Reliance and American companies inend to withdraw from the Sales Company?" we asked.

"Not the slightest truth in that statement," replied Mr. Aitkin. "It's absurd."

PATHE MANAGER RESIGNS.

Mr. E. LeBosse, who has been connected with the Pathe factory at Bound Brook, N. J., for the past four years, two of which he held the position of manager, has resigned. Mr. LeBosse expects to remain in America, but has formed no plans for the future as yet.

"A GAY DECEIVER" (Champion).

The above scene is from "A Gay Deceiver," depicting the finale of that excruciatingly funny farce-comedy in which the gay deceiving husband discovers the destroyer of his happiness in the housemaid.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT.

Wesley's Easter Egg.

WITH Easter coming apace an egg shaped cut-out, used by "Wesley Says So," is particularly apt, and almost any shop will have a die that will cut an oval if not an ovoid. The printing runs on both sides, the obverse running:

Who came first
The Egg or the Hen?
Two Free Tickets
For the Right Answer
"Wesley Says So."

The reverse reads:

This and 5 cents admits
Anyone to a matinee of MOVING PICTURES and VAUDEVILLE at the Garner Theater
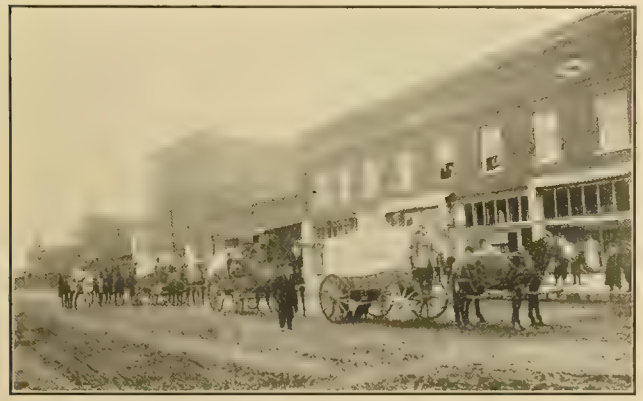
"Wesley Says So."

The egg and the hen question is almost as old as the inquiry into the chicken's motives for crossing the street, but it seems to be good for a laugh still and in a small place, particularly, it will revive the old discussion for which there is no answer. Cheap stock may be used and the advertisement is much more effective than the straight matinee reduction ticket. If you want to make more of the idea offer a prize for the best written argument for egg or hen and post the best answers on a bulletin board in the lobby or inside the house if you have a foyer. You'll have to do better than a pair of tickets, perhaps a single monthly pass, but if you work it up a little and start them off with a few letters of your own (which your friends can copy for you to give variety), you may even succeed in getting space in the daily paper for the answers if you keep on the job. But that's the answer to any proposition. Keep on the job and do not expect a scheme to work automatically for you. Nurse it along and give it proper attention.

Booming Bison Big.

S. A. Arnold, of the Lyric Theater, Mena, Arkansas, sends a photograph of his street parade for the Bison-101 Ranch feature, "War on the Plains." Mr. Arnold writes:



> I am enclosing you herewith photo showing how we featured and advertised the Bison picture, "War on the Plains." We booked this picture as a first run picture, then announced its coming with the announcement slides. On the day we were to show same the photo speaks for itself.
> This parade cost me eight dollars and brought the best business I have ever had. In the first place, we rented the Indian suits and took some of the local talent and painted them as Indians, then engaged the horses and put the Indians on bareback, and having cowboy suits, made another man up as cowboy. As for the wagons, they were easy to procure. In one wagon we had a bugler and two drummers to make the noise. The horses cost me for one hour five dollars; the wagons three dollars, and the Indians, etc., worked for the glory and a free ticket.
> With the aid of my orchestra, which is the best two-piece orchestra in the South, the people gave round after round of applause.
> You will note that we have our "houn' dogs" tied under the wagon. This parade can be made stronger by the addition of a cow tied on the back of the wagon.

Mena seems to be a moderately small place and the effect of any demonstration of this sort should be worth much more than the eight dollars invested, not alone in direct returns, but in the general effect. Always consider this latter point in figuring any advertising expense. Don't charge all to the boomed reel.

Uses Criticisms.

The Surprise Theater, South Bend, Ind., is using press criticisms to clinch its film synopses. Where first run material is used something is picked up from The Moving Picture World, if possible, otherwise a quotation is made from the manufacturer's bulletin. When possible, actual criticisms are used, being taken from this paper and others. In this way variety is gained. The use of criticisms is not new, but the Surprise works it more consistently than we have seen in other programs.

Shows Improvement.

The Lyric Theater, Libertyville, Ill., sends three programs that show their advancement. The first is one used last September, in which each title is announced without comment, the house taking about a third of each of two inside pages. A January program cuts out all advertising and falls to a single sheet printed on only one side, the bare titles and makers being announced with a single descriptive word.

The last program goes back to four pages with advertising only on the back page, and gives from two to six or eight lines to each reel. Some of the lines are taken from the program, but the original lines are snappy and pulling. They seem to be inspired by lines from the company's description of a subject, but they are given an original twist.

It takes a little longer to prepare copy for the printer if you have to think up the lines, but if you can give an extra hour to the work and make it doubly effective as a business getter it's worth the lost sleep. The man who slaps things together in a perfunctory sort of fashion is the man who is forever complaining that there is no more money in pictures. The man who is willing to hustle, to think hard to make every blow count, who puts all his energy into his work, is the man who builds up a trade that lasts even beyond the time when opposition comes. If it is not worth while advertising right it's a useless expense to advertise at all.

Vivid and Effective.

The Banner Theater, of Los Angeles, sends a card advertising Kalem's "A Spartan Mother" as the attraction for the day. The printing is in red on deep yellow, and the combination of the Spanish colors makes a striking advertisement. It is cheap stock, a throwaway, but it is carefully done, half of one side being given to the announcement and the remainder to the story, while on the reverse a large "Q" calls attention to the fact that the "Q" shows are good shows and gives the location of the Garrick, a first run house with prices from 10 to 20 cents, and the Banner, the five-cent, second run house, both under the management of the Q Amusement Company. In a throwaway the great thing is to catch the attention quickly and get even the man who runs while he reads. A striking color scheme, an effective catch line, an outline cut or some similar appeal all work well, and even the man who does not read the card or sheet will know that it is the theater that is being advertised. In this case the Q seems to be the standing appeal and it is sufficiently unusual to be effective, but here the color scheme as well has its effect. The card stands out from a mass of advertising on our desk like a factory fire.

Takes From Cameraphone.

The Pastime Theater, Akron, Ohio, sends in a four-page that suggests a connection with the Cameraphone circuit in Pittsburg, since much of the material is the same. Much of the reading material is dropped in favor of the synopses, but at that they make good use of their space, the four-page sheet being folded to suggest an eight-page form. This gives a page only four inches by eleven, but a four by ten was a favorite Keith size for a long time and works out nicely.

By using the same type and cuts for several houses the Cameraphone company not only saves on composition and cuts, but it is able to get out a far better sheet than would be possible did each house prepare its own copy.

A Suggestion to All Exhibitors.

And in this connection here is a scheme that might well be taken up at the forthcoming convention. Why should it not be possible for several exhibitors, ten or a dozen, perhaps, with houses in towns comfortably close to each other, to club together and employ some person to handle the advertising matter for all the houses? Some newspaper man might be had, or perhaps the advertising man of one of the houses, and a $40 salary (and $40 would pay a good man for part of his time), would only be four dollars apiece if ten theaters came into the agreement. If the scope of the various houses is similar arrangement might be made to form a circuit over which the reels would pass and one form, with a change in dates and advertising matter, would be suitable for all. If the reels can be sent over a circuit of ten houses, any kick would be the united kick of ten as against one, and at the same time the copy could be prepared and the inside form printed without dates, the individual houses adding their dates and advertising matter front and back, much the same as "patent insides" are printed. The locally printed form will give plenty of space for individual announcements and the saving in cost will permit the eight-page sheet to be used as cheaply as a four sheet, where all of the composition falls on a single house.

Where the circuit idea cannot be made practical, a syndicate form for all releases, to be picked up as occasion demands, can cut expenses, though not as effectively, but the point is that getting together exhibitors whose territory does not overlap can not only get better material but save money at the same time. This is an age of combination and if you can get twice as much for what you are paying it's worth a little trouble, isn't it? Form your own little advertising association.

A Musical Program.

All over the country the musical program is being given more mention and managers are beginning to realize that good music is a better attraction than poor vaudeville, but the Lyric Theater, Mena, mentioned above, contributes the first purely musical advertisement we have seen. It is a sheet eight and a half by twelve and reads:

"Backward, turn backward, O Time, in your flight,
And make me a child again just for tonight."

TONIGHT
The Lyric Orchestra
W. L. (Bill) Pursley and Claud Burns
Will help you turn back
"Time in its flight"
And make you a child again
Just for TONIGHT.
Medley Overture:
"Nellie Gray," "Old Kentucky Home," "Massa's in de Cold, Cold Ground," "Mocking Bird," "Dixie."

Down South that sort of a program should draw the crowd as effectively as a film feature, always provided that there are the films to back up the number. And this for a two-piece orchestra, at that.

Request Programs.

And along the same lines come two suggestions for request programs. The Liberty Theater, Salt Lake City, makes much of its musical program in connection with the films and gives careful attention to the selection of proper music. At the bottom of the fourteen number program is the announcement:

Your Favorite Musical Number
Will be on this program next week if you will make a request for it.
Telephone the Office, Wesatch 3292, or notify the director.

In Pittsburg the Cameraphone Bulletin announces:

> From the March list of the Victor Talking Machine Company we have selected the following records:
> "National Airs of All Nations"—By the Victor Mixed Chorus.
> "The Skeleton Rag"—By American Quartet.
> "I'm Going Back to Old Virginia"—By Campbell and Burr.
> "Red Pepper" and "The Lobsters' Promenade"—two banjo records of dash and spirit that will prove popular.
> "Moonlight Bay"—By American Quartet.
> "The Harbor of Love"—By Walter Van Brunt. (Two popular and melodious songs that you will enjoy.)
> "Bless Your Ever Lovin' Little Heart"—By Walter Van Brunt.
> "Come Kiss the Blarney, Mary Darling"—By Harvey Hindermeyer. (The first is a new and popular sentimental ballad and the other is an entertaining little Irish song.)
> Lovers of comedy will enjoy "That Haunting Melody," "Rum Tum Tiddle," two records by Al Jolson that are sure to create a laugh.
> "Pickaninny's Lullaby"—By Elsie Baker.
> "Mammy's Song"—By John Barnes Wells.
> (Two delightful little darkey lullaby songs.)
> Cameraphone patrons seem to enjoy quartette records, so we have selected two from "That Girl" Quartette, "Senorita" and "In Dixie Land with Dixie Lou."
> "Little Boy Blue" is still playing in New York to large audiences and "Love Never Dies" from this popular play will prove attractive.
> "Dreamy Days," by Reed Miller, is a pleasing little song about the coming of Spring.
> "Alonquin March" and "A Cyclone in Darktown"—two records by Pryor's Band, which will be sure to please you.
> Ask the usher to have your favorite record played.

The running comment greatly augments the value of the announcement, but we've grown used to seeing the Cameraphone doing things well.

Classy? Well! Well!

Talking about classiness! We have received from Manager J. S. Phillips, of the Gideon Theater, Fort Worth, Texas, a copy of his opening program after house had been shut down for renovation. It stopped as a "five-center" and opened at ten, and Mr. Phillips writes that the mailing of some three thousand circulars brought a turnaway business at the new price. He adds that the house is now done in white and gold, which is why the program is in the same. A program in color scheme to match the house certainly is going some, but if the house matches the program we don't wonder that the ten-cent price is accepted. They cost more than a black and white program would, but they "look more than ten cents," and the money was not wasted. Mr. Phillips has a few left and generously offers to send them as long as the supply lasts, but unless you want to do something really worth while leave them for those who do, as the supply is limited. An insert in black gives portraits of John Bunny, Miss Alice Joyce, Maurice Costello and G. M. Anderson, but as these are in 50 or 60 screen and on plate paper the grain is too coarse. Possibly time did not permit the procuring of proper cuts, but it would have been better had the 90 or even 120 screen been used. Suit your screen to your paper and the rapidity of the press work and you will get results, but on good paper the coarse screen looks cheap. It is the one fault to be found with an otherwise handsome issue. Even as it is the program will doubtless be kept as a souvenir and in any event will have had its effect before being thrown away.

Reversible Front Pages.

Mr. Phillips also sends some of the old advertising, including a small four-page folder with a reversible front page, first used, we believe, by the San Francisco Figaro. The Figaro used to sell all advertising on the back page and, by folding the four pages in reverse, they had two back pages to sell instead of one. Mr. Phillips uses the idea so that the first half of the week the first half of the bill may be brought forward, while on Thursday the change is made and the third page is folded outside. That Mr. Phillips is awake to his opportunities is shown by his announcement that a three-reel bull fight picture is produced "In the Interest of the Humane Societies," which is a very cute little line when you come to figure it out. Almost as good is the announcement that Enrico Caruso produced the Pathe "Il Trovatore." It doesn't worry Caruso any and it helps business in Fort Worth. It is permissible to stretch the truth a bit when no one gets hurt and Mr. Phillips seems to have the trick to perfection. These statements injure no one and they do make for attraction.

Mr. Phillips seems to share our liking for good paper and proper typographic display and all of the samples he sends, with the exception of the "Il Trovatore" throwaway, are printed on paper that some might regard as being too good, but which the careful advertiser will realize has its effect. He also has the trick of writing catchy heads for his newspaper squibs which he uses whenever the weather is promising, for he has found that southerners do not seek amusement in wet weather and he wisely husbands his energies for times when it will count.

Even So.

The Tenth Street Theater, Kansas City, sends in its latest issue with the comment "one of the best yet," with which we are in agreement whether the sender refers to the front page or straight through. But it still runs shy of the chatty stuff that the Cameraphone people never seem to be at a loss for, yet the Cameraphone man picks his stuff from this paper, the various manufacturers' bulletins and press clips. We think that if the Tenth Street will hold to that cover for the week of March 17th and kill a couple of ad pages to get in more matter set in eight-point double column (which is more easily read), that they would get back the money they lose on advertising space plus the cost of composition. Give your people something to read and you can prove that they take it home. Give them some local stuff as well as clips and be breezy without being impertinent, and it will be worth while. We are flattered that the present clip is taken from The Moving Picture World, but they are running an editorial serially through three issues where the meatiest paragraphs in a single issue would have sufficed.

And Are You Wise to Kalem?

And speaking of meaty paragraphs, we think the Kalem Kalendar gives more really good stuff than any other publication on either the Licensed or Independent sides. Lubin gives out some mighty good press agent stuff, and the Edison and Vitagraph companies contribute useful paragraphs for the exhibitor, but the Kalem publication gives newspaper stuff—ten lines good reading and one line about Kalem—that is all the more valuable because the pill (which isn't a very polite simile), is so heavily coated with sugar. Any live editor could print most of the stuff on the left hand pages of the Kalem sheet without feeling that he was a "fall guy," and that's the very best sort of press work. The Implet is the best on the Independent end with the Thanhouser a good second, but we object to the unbound and rather incoherent arrangement of the Thanhouser News.

We Guess We Won't!

A couple of weeks ago in commenting on the Newsome Talks we offered to run a series of talks if a sufficient number of exhibitors would express their willingness to use them. Up to this writing the Surprise Theater, South Bend, Ind., is the only house to express a desire for the series and we do not believe in giving the space to the stuff unless a reasonable number of exhibitors want it. It seems that they don't and so we guess we won't. We thank the Surprise for its interest.

Crisp and Effective.

Billie Worby, of the Fordham Palace, in the Bronx, sends in a four-page folder. The front carries the general advertising and the back the coming feature, while inside the two pages are divided into halves for as many days, the date being boxed at the side in this fashion:

Sunday March 3d.	Extras HIS DAUGHTER O-you girls, girls, girls, although we may be light hearted at times we now become serious and offer the above which teaches a lesson which will long be remembered. BRONCHO BILLY AND THE SCHOOL MISTRESS Another adventure of that wonderful hero with plenty of love interest, excitement and thrills WILLIE'S SISTER Willie doesn't make a hit. O-No-but "Willies Sister" does, and puts her brother "in right" with the boys. Then Willie gets back at them. He laughs last and you all laugh all the way through.

The lines are breezy and suited to the clientele, though it is not always to be recommended that this style be adopted. For a cheap folder we like the method of display since it makes the dates stand out. By using the back page as well, the program for the week can be gotten on one sheet, distribution being made Friday and Saturday and the announcement starting with the Saturday bill.

The SCENARIO WRITER

CONDUCTED BY EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

"Officer, He's in Again!"

A FEW weeks ago we commented on the efforts of one H. R. Wright, of Philadelphia, to establish an organization of scenario writers for defense and offense. Because from a number of letters we had read and which had been sent by Mr. Wright to various prospective members, we expressed our disbelief in the good such an organization might accomplish; an opinion in which Spectator, of the Dramatic Mirror and William Lord Wright, of the News, have concurred.

Because we made inquiry as to the organization of one of the Trustees, S. Walter Bunting, the only scenario writer whose name appeared in the directorate, we were scored by Mr. Wright with terrible scorn. He also demanded space in this paper for a retraction, the space being refused since Mr. Wright begged the issue. We were also favored with a personal reply to our letter of explanation in which we pointed out that our objection to this society was based on the improbability that any agitation along the lines he proposed would be of benefit. His answer was rambling, incoherent and did not deal with the essential facts.

At the same time he got out the circular letter which follows and which we believe has been sent to all who answered his advertisement:

> ### Who's A Liar?
> Doubtless you will have read The Moving Picture World dated March 16th, 1912, and the "We do Not Like Its Looks," story by Epes. Please note, the "we" in his piffle, and remember that only editors and persons with tape worms are allowed to use the plural—and I "hae me doots" as to Epes being an editor. He certainly can use more words and say less than any man I ever knew. Maybe he likes it.
> A visitor to a "bug house," saw one of the inmates pounding his head with a monkey wrench and asked him, "Why?" "Oh, I feel fine after I stop," he answered. "Mebbe" that's Epes; he's got words in his system, and he'll feel better after he gets them out. Epes is a real paternal sort of a cuss though isn't he? Note how he cherishes the innocent, embryotic scenario writer? Observe how he would look after his welfare at so much a page? No, why you've missed the fireworks gentle reader. Go back to that Moving Picture World for March 16th, 1912, and turn to page 1018; then ruminate on a nifty little ad. on the first column. Yep, that's the big show, and don't you think The Moving Picture World a dandy representative of all the scenario writers of America to let Epes tout his game in the editorial pages? Believe me, if The Moving Picture World will give me that much space for a $10 ad. I'll be tickled to death.
> However, to return to our muttons, as Panurge said—
> Epes says he has information that this association is composed of soreheads; that the film manufacturers are against it and me. Whoops my dear, I've offered $100 to any charity that the editor of The Moving Picture World cares to mention if he can prove the first assertion and—open your pores and let this soak in. I have three letters from film manufacturers stating, "That they are heartily in sympathy with the A. S. W. A. and its objects." Now then, is there anything you want to know about the A. S. W. A. or myself?
> Send on your ??? and, incidentally, just one script, your best. It may be that I can show you how to make that scenario of yours worth more money than you ever received for its mate.
> Very truly,

Endeavoring to adapt our style to that approved by Mr. Wright, we gave him this last chance to make good:

> My dear Mr. Wright:
> Your letter tires me. I tell you that I have read a score or more of your fanatical letters and then you rave that I know nothing about you first hand. What difference does it make whether I get your number from the letter you write me or the chap you're trying to herd into your benevolent society? And where did you get that twenty-five years' newpaper experience you speak of? From your literary style I imagine you got it on the New Orleans Sun or some kindred publication. But even at that, if you've been in the game for twenty-five years, don't you know that a form letter has the same privacy as any other circular or printed advertisement? If you don't it is high time you learned. I know you have three letters from film manufacturers or rather their scenario editors. Also I have on file a letter asking me not to print one, as it was written without the supposition that it was to be used. You were being kidded and didn't know it. If I'm a good guesser the three letters you sent The World are —, — and —, in that order. Right?
> Now I'm going to take you at your word and come to the fountain head for information. Here are the questions:
> What do you propose giving your members for their $10 or $15?
> What is your paid membership?
> Have you a charter of incorporation?
> May the same information be had from the Secretary of State?
> What is the date of issue?
> Does any part of the charter state that a sales bureau—on commission to you,—forms a part of the aims of the society?
> If not, why not?
> Has any person a voice in the management of your society beside yourself and Mr. Latour?
> Don't you know that either the sender or the recipient is entitled to give out letters for publication?
> And here is a more personal question. It is charged by a western correspondent that your A. S. W. A. is but an annex to the Literary Bureau Scenario School, yet I learn that you are querying even those who refused to come into the scheme and asking them to send you scripts to sell.
> Are you double crossing the Literary Bureau or what?
> And what qualifications have you for running a society for the revolutionizing of the scenario business?
> I pause for a reply. To conform to custom I enclose a stamped envelope that there may be no excuse. I like your chatty letters even if they lack the literary form and elegance one might expect of the author of The Author's Magazine.

To this the Philadelphia Moses made reply that he would not answer the questions (though it was his own suggestion that we ask him what we wished to know), until we first returned sworn answers to eight questions he submitted which had to do with our literary experience, the profits from the bureau of criticism, which seems to be the thorn in Mr. Wright's flesh since he proposes improving upon our example by starting a school, critical bureau and sales bureau, and which seek to prove that we are in the pay of the manufacturers.

We feel that no explanation is due Mr. Wright, but for the benefit of those readers who have received the Wright circular we would explain that the page reference has to do with an advertisement regularly appearing in this paper and which may be found by reference to the index to advertisements in this issue.

We took up this critical work at the instance of The Editor literary bureau, The Editor being the leading trade paper for authors. When we sought to broaden the scope of our work by advertising, the Editor wanted to declare in on this additional work without sharing the cost of the advertising and we withdrew from that arrangement and confined ourselves to the reading of the scripts submitted to us personally. The advertisement appears in two publication and we are content if we break even on the cost of publication. It makes no glowing promises, but simply offers correct technical advice for those who desire it and is by no means the get-rich-quick concern Mr. Wright seems to think it. It does, however, fulfil our purpose of keeping in touch with the troubles of the beginner and enables us to conduct more intelligently this page, which is designed in part for the novice.

The situation is not unlike our earlier critical experience when we found no mystification in a magical act because we knew how the tricks were done. We mastered the bulk of the scenario tricks long since and we need something to keep our memory fresh as to the trials of the beginner that we may write the stuff that is helpful; and not all of these questions come in the form of inquiries.

We tried a sales bureau but the poor quality of the scripts and the very apparent lack of any advantage to the author led to the abandonment of the offer within a month. Since then we have confined our offer to criticism because we believe that with an efficient text book or the hints to scenario writers offered free by various companies, the beginner has no need of schools and little or no need of criticism save as a check upon his work or for the solution of the problem as to whether the script is returned because of the author's fault or because the studio fails to recognize its merit. We believe the service is useful because of our knowledge of the scenario business in all its angles. The work of revision has been confined to three promising scripts, two of which were sold.

The only money we receive "directly or indirctly from manufacturers," to quote the Book of Moses, is for comedies supplied the Lubin company because, through long association, we know better than the outsider precisely what A. D. Hotaling, the Lubin comedy director, wants.

In publishing our letter to Mr. Wright we again ask the questions, because we have information that leads us to believe that the membership is too small to pay for the charter.

Mr. Wright offers $100 if we can prove our statement that we believe the organization is to be made up of soreheads. If he will deposit the money with Mr. Ira M. Lowery, general manager of the Lubin company, or Mr. C. B. Smith, Sunday Editor of the Philadelphia North American, we will endeavor to obtain for him his signed letter in which he states that of 126 replies received his correspondent is the first to speak a good word for the film companies.

To quote from a more recent classic than Panurge we courteously inquire WHO'S LOONEY NOW?
—and leave the reader to judge for himself.

The Edison Leaflet.

We spoke last week of the fact that the Edison company no longer mailed out receipts for scenarios, since the writing of which Mr. Horace G. Plimpton, their Manager of Negative Production has courteously sent us the sheet which we print here. This slip is sent out in answer to any inquiry that it may cover. Read it now and you will not have to take trouble to write the company.

> In view of the large number of plots submitted to us we find it necessary to adapt certain rules as follows:
> 1 -Each plot must be submitted in scenario form and accompanied by a synopsis not exceeding two hundred and fifty words in length, in which the essential points of the plot are clearly set forth.
> 2—Scenarios must be typewritten, on one side of the paper only, and preferably on letter size paper about 8½ x 11 inches.
> 3—A stamped addressed envelope should accompany each scenario. No loose stamps should be sent.
> 4—If the plot sent is not original with the author the source from which it is taken must be plainly stated. No consideration will knowingly be given to an infringement upon a copyrighted book, magazine, story, or play and it should be clearly understood that the penalty for such infringement is severe.
> 5—No acknowledgement will be made of the receipt of a scenario.
> 6—Due care will be used in handling scenarios and, if the conditions above noted are complied with, in returning those rejected. We disclaim, however, all responsibility for their safe keeping or > return. If submitted to us they are sent at the author's risk.

> 7—Our prices for scenarios vary in accordance with their value to us. The author may, if he wishes, note on a scenario his own price, in which case it will be considered on that basis.

To those who have had no dealings with the company the sixth clause may seem formidable, but "due care" in this instance means proper care, for we do not know of any company that gets scripts back to the author in better shape than the Edison corporation. The short synopsis was alluded to a few weeks ago. It might be well to remember that the company is most particular in regard to copyright infringement and it is well not to derive too much "inspiration" from a copyrighted story in a script sent them.

Reliance and Imp.

Both the Reliance and Imp companies have adopted the explanatory rejection slip recently used by Mrs. Rubenstein, of the Lubin company, after a suggestion in this department that something of the sort used by some fiction authors might be adapted to film use. The Imp slip accepts the emendations recommended by this page regarding the "moral tone" suggestion.

When you stop to think it over, picture editors are far more courteous and helpful than their brothers of the magazine field. Before the introduction of the checked slip many editors had a helpful habit of offering some explanation to the author and several companies have issued instructive slips that form the basis of most correspondence school courses.

There is a selfish motive back of it all, for the scenario writing profession is young yet and there is need of training to get the best results. William Lord Wright points out that three of the four winners in the recent Imp prize scenario contest were experienced men and that the great mass of submissions were impossible. Scenario writing is at once too easy and too difficult. Up to a certain point anyone can lay out a scenario, but beyond that few ever get because they grow discouraged before they gain the experience that brings success. Anything that helps them along will help the business and the addition of Reliance and Imp to the Lubin company is welcomed on behalf of the scenario writers.

Two Questions.

A Chicago correspondent wants to know what companies are not taking material at present. He adds: "I am aware that the Biograph, Capitol, Thanhouser, Eclair and Nestor are not accepting outside scenarios at the present time."

The Biograph buys mostly from a little group of experienced men. Eclair has stated that they will buy nothing for the next couple of months. Essanay is out of the market for an indefinite period. Thanhouser never was in the market and Nestor is buying in limited quantities. It was stated by the latter concern recently that the eastern studio would be reopened for the summer.

The correspondent also wants to know what has become of Archer McMackin and suggests that he has a perverted sense of humor because he accepted Trombone Tommy and passed up the scripts of the inquirer. Mr. McMackin's perverted sense of humor has led him into the ranks of the Essanay comedy producers where, we think, he is doing capital work in spite of his blindness to the scripts of the complainant. And it seems to us that if we had "enough Essanay slips to paper a room" we would court rejection somewhere else just for a change and make a dado to go with the Essanay ground.

Condensing the Synopsis.

We have had letters from several correspondents who complain that they find it impossible to get their synopses into the 250 words that the Edison company desires, but we fail to see why the average single reel script cannot be put into that synopsis space if the reader only understands what the synopsis really is.

When you take up the daily paper you will find that each item of news important enough to be printed by itself is given what the newspaper men call a head. This may be a five or six word line or it may be spread across the entire paper and take up more space than the item itself. But in all cases its function is to attract attention to the item of news, to tell the reader at a glance to what it refers and give a summary of the salient points. If the reader is interested in that sort of news he reads the item for the details. If it does not interest him he reads the head and passes on to something else.

The synopsis is no more than the headline of the photoplay. The editor reads the synopsis. If it is the sort of story that his company produces and if it sounds reasonably novel he reads the scenario, but if he is looking for indoor society stuff and the synopsis tells him that he has a western outdoor drama, he drops the script into the envelope and continues his search.

You do not have to tell all that happens in every scene in order to tell what the story is about. Skeletonize the story but make it interesting. Do not commence it: "Nellie Hampton has lived in the quiet little village of Greenville all the eighteen years of her life, but as our story opens she meets Paul Dexter, a young artist, who has come to Greenville on a sketching trip. Dexter, who is a rising young artist, is handsome, accomplished, but unscrupulous. He induces Nellie to act as his model for a painting which he is to enter in the Salon the next exhibition and after much reluctance she consents." You can say the same thing in fewer words. "Paul Dexter, an artist, induces Nell Hampton to act as his model during a sketching tour in the country." That's all that the editor wants to know and if he gets interested in the headline he'll read the rest, but like the newspaper reader he has not time to read all the stories. Say it in two hundred words and you'll get him reading if you have the sort of story he wants, but if you send in a couple of pages of synopsis it may not be read at all.

Keep this in mind when you think you can't get your synopsis so short: The editor can find those who can and who are willing to consult the convenience of the purchaser and some of these can write just as good stuff as you can, no matter who you may be.

More About Casts.

We print this letter from G. J. M. because it is the clearest of a number of similar inquiries. He asks:

> In scenario writing do I have to make a cast of my characters? For instance I have a saloon scene with about fifteen men in it. Must I invent names for all these men or just the names of my leaders?

The cast of characters is supposed to be devoted to those whose actions advance the story. On the dramatic stage they would be said to have speaking parts and they are named that they may be identified. It is easier to call the husband John than say "the husband" or "the hero" and if you add to the name of the character a brief description you help the director in his work. You can either say:

James Jones—a rich merchant, or else be more fully descriptive and write him in in this fashion:

James Jones, a rich merchant. The sleek, well fed type of prosperous business man. Rather pompous and set in his ways.

There you've drawn a pen picture of the man that will give the director your idea of the type of man you have had in mind while you were writing your story.

But extra people are "supes" in play or photoplay and their names are not used. After you have gone through your cast of people for the acting roles add a list of extras like this:

Men for saloon in scene 3.
Miners in scenes 7-11.
Coroner's jury, witnesses, etc., in 18.

This is amply sufficient for your extract, never mind their names.

A Rose by Any Other Name.

Here is a letter from E. M. Hawthorne, of Seattle, who writes:

> For the first time in my experience I saw the name of a scenario writer on the screen the other night while watching one of the Kalem Co's. plays. It occurred to me that the Average Patron (of whom I read such a good description in a recent issue of your magazine) doesn't know what a scenario is. Now, the credit that comes to the scenario writer must come largely through "Mr. A. P.," and wouldn't it be a better plan to say "Photo-play written by ———," instead of using the term "Scenario" on the screen? I am much interested in your Scenario department and would like to see this question commented upon.

The writer is a little behind the times in noting the credit. The Edison company has used some names for more than a year and now uses the names of many authors while the Kalem, Reliance and others are doing the same thing, but the point raised is interesting.

Personally we think the term scenario is a misnomer. It is a photoplay and not a scenario. Properly the scenario is merely a more or less brief condensation of a dramatic play, giving the essential facts with or without bits of the dialogue. When the dramatic stage manager came into the motion picture business he brought the term with him for want of a better and it has been accepted generally as the term for a play wholly written in action and inserts.

The word is not correctly used save that by common acceptance it has been incorporated into the language and we differ with our correspondent's doubts as to the knowledge of the general public. Even those who do not frequent photoshows will know what is meant. "Photoplay written by John Smith" might read more smoothly and therefore is to be preferred, but we do not believe that photoplay would be any more intelligible than scenario so far as definiteness goes.

The main point at issue is the use of the author's name on the screen and we welcome the Reliance company into this division of producers. The Imp company should also be noted in this connection, but the Reliance is the latest and it is a part of Mr. Terwilliger's campaign to get the best possible scripts for his company. The use of the credit line is bringing into the field more good writers than the outsider yet realizes.

Naughty!

Responding to our invitation to come on in, a feminine correspondent frankly admits herself to be a disgruntled scenario writer "or rather near scenario writer," she explains, "for as yet all, I did not say how many, have been returned," and she goes on to say that it wearies her to compare her stories with "the trash one sees every visit to a picture show." She is confident that her ideas are better and wonders why it is that photoplayers, who seem to be intelligent, will consent to pose for such foolish things as some of the screened offerings. She adds: "Might I not ask a question here? We poor, deluded mortals spend our time and energies working out plots and putting them in shape. How do we know our ideas are not made note of and used? It would be a good trick if they do it. Truly if I should put into print what I really thought in regard to the film companies I would be arrested."

We confess to a growing feeling of weariness when we read the wail of those who want to know why it is that their fine scripts are turned down in favor of the rot that gets on the screen. We would be the last to contend that only good stories are filmed. We'll admit that much of the stuff rejected is better than some of the stuff made, but the people who get the good stuff back are not the ones who raise complaint. As a rule they know it's good and keep it traveling until it makes a sale sometime.

It's the man with the good idea but the faulty technique, who sends in the script in such a condition that it would take a couple of days to make it over into a photoplay, who says with some justice that his story is better than much he sees. He doesn't know anything about technique and he is too busy kicking about rejections to study to avoid them. He knows he has a story and he's sore at everything because his story is not purchased, yet he keeps on sending out stuff that is utterly and hopelessly impossible, until someone else writes something that by a stretch of the imagination might be regarded as somewhat similar in some feature to the rejection. Then the growl about superiority is forgotten in the new yowl about the dishonest scenario editors. The complaint nauseates us. Here is what William Lord Wright has written on the subject:

> The sooner a certain class of writers get this plot-stealing-bug out off their minds, the better for all concerned.

> long experience as a scenario "dopester," never but once had occasion to query on the subject of confliction of ideas. The trouble was immediately and satisfactorily explained. No editor of any reputable company will steal your plots, any more than the editor of any reputable magazine would print your story without pay. Get down to business and write good "dope" and the plot-stealing-hoodoo will soon be forgotten.

To all of which we would say "Amen!"

If you have an idea that scenario editors steal your material, why send them more to steal? If the picture writing business is conducted by a pack of thieves why mix up with it? If you know your ideas are stolen why keep sending your stories in? You do not have to associate with thieves. You do not have to send your scenarios to any company and, if you are certain that your ideas are stolen, why keep on supplying the robbers with more material?

For more than three months this page has been looking for an established case of theft; not allegation but definite fact. We thought once we had a clear case, but inquiry proved that the company was merely waiting for the author to see the announcement of release and supply the address he had neglected to put on his script. We have investigated about twenty promising cases and we have yet to find a reasonably authentic case of idea stealing, and by "reasonable" we mean one where even circumstantial evidence will bear out the complainant's charge. Long before this page was instituted we were interested in this matter, both as a scenario editor and scenario writer, and we have not yet been able to convince ourselves that the practice is even sporadic. We do believe that now and then a story read will give a suggestion to a reader who may turn it to his own profit, but it is not often that even this is done, and assuredly not as an habitual thing, nor is it done even then for the profit of the company. We are tired of hearing vague statements unbacked by facts.

If you think your scenario ideas are being stolen don't write scenarios. If you know they are stolen write the manufacturer, but because you and thirty others have all written stories on the same theme and one of them is good enough to gain acceptance, don't get the idea that you are the only person who ever thought of that idea and whine about the way your ideas are stolen.

It's a simple proposition.

If the editors persist in using the rotten ideas of someone else in preference to your own fine plots, don't waste your postage on them.

If they persist in stealing your ideas don't give them any to steal.

But if you stay in the game play fair and be nice.

INQUIRIES

F. H. C.—We told you what we supposed was meant by the plot being "too sketchy," but we don't know what is meant by the additional statement that because of that fact it could not be made to register. There are some things that are too deep even for the editor of an inquiry department and when we try to skip gracefully out of it you press us again. You go write Selig for an answer. Perhaps the man who wrote it knows, but we'll be blamed if we do. If you find out please wise us up.

FLORENCE R.—The reason the advertisement appears as it does is because the man who pays for the advertising wants it run that way, and we know of no rule that compels this particular company to advertise its casts. The lead in Lubin's "Mexican Courtship" was Miss Edna Payne. There are a number of leading ladies with the Edison Company; so many, in fact, that we hesitate to print the list lest some be unintentionally ignored. Sorry we can't oblige, but answers to general questions such as this are barred.

INTERESTED READER.—Your suggestion that credit to the original author should enable you to market your adaptation of his ideas is interesting, but not well founded. The copyright law gives to the originator the right to use it in any form for a full period of 56 years. If you want to adapt a copyright idea you must first arrange with the author and it is up to you to find out whether the idea is still protected or not. Just as a matter of fact they have people in the studios who can make better arrangements of scripts than you can. If you cannot think up ideas of your own do not try to write scenarios. Only original ideas are wanted. The manufacturer can make better terms with the author than you.

J. M.—Miss Betty Harte was the Mercedes, Herbert Rawlinson the Don Juan and Hobart Bosworth the Alcalde in Selig's "The Shrinking Rawhide" (not the Krinkling Rawhide). Brinsley Shaw was the Essanay villain in this and other Western productions. Four questions is letting us down easy. Come on again and you'll be welcome.

K. L. B.—We do not answer questions by mail and someone got your stamp before we saw it. The reason that the Pathe cameramen caught the stalled train before the relief came through was that the roads were not wholly blocked. The Pathe Weekly cameramen are distributed through the country and when they are wired to go and get a subject they do not wait for the trains if the trains are not running. The weekly is very much like the organization of a newspaper staff. A central editor guides the staff and when they are told to get some particular feature it is up to them to get it in a hurry, no matter what difficulties may present themselves. You are always welcome until you commence asking if they are married.

H. M. P.—The Western section of the Essanay Company is located at San Rafael, California. G. M. Anderson is at the head of the company and Miss Vedah Bertram is the present leading woman.

L. H.—Film manufacturers have the right to use the author's name when they buy his script. As a rule the shoe is on the other foot and complaint is made because so many companies do not use names. C. G. P. C. is the designation of the European-made films of the Pathe Freres. They do not use American scripts. Scripts intended for Pathe Freres should be sent to 1 Congress Avenue, Jersey City Heights, N. J., and should be typically American.

A. P. F.—"Scenario form" means the form in which scenarios are written. This, in its turn, means that the story is written in action instead of narrative or dialogue, and is divided into scenes for the convenience of the director. As an example you do not write "John entered the room and carlessly crossing to the table picked up the letter," but, "John enters room—goes to table—takes up letter." After you have written your scenario, you make a short synopsis or story of the plot and precede the scenario with this synopsis and a cast of characters. There is no "average number of words for a 1,000-foot reel." The length of the scene, not the length of the script, is the determining factor. As a rule from 18 to 25 scenes, depending on their length, make up the full reel.

PICTURE FAN.—Miss Mildred Weston was the heroine in Essanay's "A Hen House Hero." Additional to our reply last week you will be interested in knowing that Miss Edna Fisher, formerly of the Western Essanay Company, is now with the Western section of the Vitagraph Company.

LEON G.—Sorry to keep you waiting, but we had to query the company. The release dates of the Vitagraph's "Life of Moses" (5 reels), are December 4th, 1909, January 4th and 25th, February 12th and 19th, 1910. The same company's three-reel version of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" was released July 26th, 29th and 30th, 1910. Both are still current releases, having lived past the usual release stage and become standard.

L. L. M.—Walker Miller was the successful suitor in Rex's "Readin', 'Ritin,' and 'Rithmetic.'"

T. N. F.—In Essanay's "A Western Kimona." Alkali was Augustus Carney, the Wife was Miss Edna Fisher and the Baby declines to permit her name to be published. Coming reels with Miss E. Dolores Cassinelli are "Napatia and Our Neighbor's Wife."

HARRY L.—You've offered a beauty. We are saving it for the scenario page for next week. Just goes to show——.

W. H. K.—We do not answer questions propounded in a spirit of levity. If you do not believe this is a serious business come over some time and help answer them.

DAN.—Miss Turner is so far from being laid up that elsewhere in this or the next issue you'll find an account of her triumph in Portland, Oregon, where she is the guest of the People's Amusement Company, and drawing crowds that necessitate her making her entrance into the houses through the fire alleys. We do not know whether she will join the Western company for a time or come directly East. She is in the Vitagraph release of April 8th.

T. J. J.—We do not find Marshall P. Wilder's photographs listed by the Vitagraph, but we believe that if you will address Mr. Wilder in care of the company, he will tell you where they may be had.

T. D. B.—No charge is made for answering questions. Ask as many as you wish, in reason, so long as they are relevant.

D. C. P.—We believe the marking has something to do with the censorship by the police, since it appears only on the scripts of the Chicago companies.

L. R.—We do not know where you can go to get educational and religious films. Our most recent inquiry relative to the latter, of the General Film Company, brought a most discouraging response. There is supposed to be a special department to handle this end, but the person in charge is silent as to where reels may be had.

V. T.—President Taft does not charge for facilities extended the motion picture companies. It is part of the duty of a public official these days to pose for the pictures and this goes for both sides of the water.

THE LUBIN CHILD WONDER.

Master Roswell "Buster" Johnson is probably the most wonderful twenty-five pounds of intelligence and dramatic ability in the profession. Born in New York, he is now scarcely 3½ years old, 2 feet 9 inches high and has been working for the Lubin Manufacturing Company since he was two years of age. Many children are used in the Lubin stock companies, but Buster is always the star kiddie. He plays girls or boys with equal intelligence and the more mischief required in the role the better. In a recent photoplay called the "Kiddies' Christmas," five children were used. Four of them were brought from New York City on account of their ability, they ranged from five to nine years of age and had appeared in many of the Broadway productions, but on the animated screen not one of them stood a chance against little Roswell Johnson. He is an unusually handsome blonde, well built and as robust as a fawn. Among the patrons of the moving picture houses "Buster" is well known and a big favorite.

Comments on the Films

Licensed.

"THE GREAT DIAMOND ROBBERY" (Vitagraph), March 15.—A farce that is amusing, but not equal in merit to the typical Vitagraph comedies. The settings are, for the most part, a "Dunderbeck" butcher shop where we see dogs disappearing and where we also see sausages appearing. The diamond disappeared from a neighbor's apartment at the same time as a pet dog. The detectives buy all of Dunderbeck's sausages to find the diamond on the supposition that the dog first swallowed the gem and then was caught and cared for in the sausage meat machine. The mystery, however, is otherwise solved. The photographs are good. Mr. Phillips plays the butcher; Kate Price, the cook who borrowed the diamond; Miss Walker the ring's owner, Messrs. Powers and Porsen, the detectives.

"FROM TENT TO MANSION" (Cines), March 12.—An Italian story of two circus children whose lot was hard until a rich woman adopted the boy because he resembled a child of her own, now dead. Through this lad, the girl later, is also adopted. The interest centers not in the boy but in the girl, and yet the lad is forced forward, weakening the picture. The story doesn't drag heavily, but is sentimental, old fashioned and unconvincingly conducted. The backgrounds are, for American audiences, very interesting indeed. The photographs are fine. It is a filler.

"MRS. 'ENRY 'AWKINS" (Vitagraph), March 13.—A cheery, wholly commendable picture of costermonger life in good comedy spirit which pleased the audience very much. The character portrayals of every one in the cast, there are only four or five who play roles, is excellent; but that of Van Dyke Brooke, the old, gouty father, is very fine. We didn't recognize him in this part. Liza, the girl, is played most charmingly by Miss Norma Talmage. Her two lovers are a costermonger owner of a donkey cart (Mr. Costello) and a pugilist (Mr. Morey). The action is brisk and dramatic. It is well photographed and makes a most entertaining release, a very good feature to brighten up an audience on a rainy day.

"THE SENTRY ON GUARD" (Eclipse), March 13.—A picture in which a green soldier on guard refuses to let Napoleon pass. He doesn't know him and had been ordered, on pain of death, to let none pass. He thus saves the great commander's life; for a woman whom Napoleon thought friendly was waiting to assassinate him. None of these Napoleon pictures has failed to be entertaining. This is very clearly told, dramatic and effective, although it is not so good as the best have been. The photographs of some of the scenes could hardly have been made better and the acting, settings and costuming all are highly commendable. We fear to call it a sure feature; but it is a good picture and will be liked.

"THE FIRST WOMAN JURY IN AMERICA" (Vitagraph), March 11.—A picture with an amusing comedy situation and with some first class comic character sketching. Miss Flora Finch is the forewoman of the jury; Bunny is the court officer who knows how to handle the jury; and there are several others in the cast who play amusing roles. It happens in California. The receipt of the summons had made one jurywoman very self-important and she, because another is forewoman and not her, refuses to agree until the court officer persuades her. The spectators laughed heartily and often. The photographs are fine.

"IOLA'S PROMISE" (Biograph), March 14.—An Indian picture with chase, battle and massacre. It is a good feature picture, truly thrilling and plainly pleased the audience. The plot, though very interesting, does not rise very far above commonplace; yet the acting and business show careful, painstaking thought and artistic ability; the very backgrounds seem alive and full of atmosphere. Iola, the Indian maid, found that there were two kinds of white people. The cut-throats held her in captivity and were cruel; but the miner who took her away from them was different—he was the "cross heart" kind. Iola's people chased a caravan, overtook it and massacred all but two, a father and daughter. Iola found that they were "cross heart" kind and gave her life to free them. The white girl was the miner's sweetheart and he, with other miners, was coming to the rescue. Iola's promise to the miner was to find gold for him. She died in a place where there was gold. The ending (just a few feet) decidedly falls down, but it comes too late to spoil the picture. The action never drags and there are some first class thrills. The photographs are very good.

"A FLURRY IN FURNITURE" (Essanay), March 14.—A farce comedy with more than one laugh in it due to the setting. The situation is unusually artificial for Essanay pictures. The photographs are fine. It is a very good filler.

"THE SHERIFF'S DAUGHTER" (Melies), March 14.—If we are not mistaken, this is the most carelessly conducted and obscure picture that has come from the Melies studio. We watched it, but cannot tell with certainty just what happened in that valley in the West where it is set. It is a poor picture, or else a badly made print.

"THE SLIP" (Selig), March 14.—There are three kinds of slips—a slip of paper, a slip through the fingers of the police and a slip in plans that brings about an arrest of wrongdoers. All three kinds come, naturally, into this strong picture in the order we have given them. It is an unusually clever detective story, truly instructive as well as exciting and with an undercurrent of most amusing irony. It shows three sharp swindlers and how they are doing business. It then shows how the post office authorities are set upon their trail; how one detective after another (there are a half dozen on the case) fails to "nab" the people they are after and whom we want to see nabbed in spite of our interest in them; how, in the end, they are "rounded up." We commend it as a feature for any and all occasions. There is no reason why it couldn't be shown in a Sunday school, that we can see.

"THE LOAN SHARK" (Essanay), March 15.—An educational story; in truth, it is more of a tract than a story, although the imaginative portrayal of the loan shark gives to it unusual interest. Its purpose seems to be to picture the possibilities when a salaried man resorts to such a lender of money. It lives on our hatred of the ruthless, grasping character, the usurer, rather than on our sympathy for the young man and wife who fall into his clutches. It isn't convincing as actual experience to-day, with the usury laws as they are. Things to-day may be bad enough and we commend the picture as a desirable number to show. The photographs are very good. There is one poor set in it.

"THE COIN OF FATE" (C. G. P. C.), March 15.—It was a counterfeit coin given by a rich man to a poor girl who couldn't afford to buy needed medicine for her sick mother. The charitable man had just buried his daughter. The coin caused much trouble in the girl's home and her mother died because of it. The rich man later adopted the girl. It would have been more convincing if he had married her. We saw it on a rainy day and found it most oppressive. On the brightest of days it would be slow, and it harrows our feelings without convincing us. The reel is full length. The photographs are good.

"THE SURPRISE PARTY SURPRISED" (Lubin), March 20.—A comedy at a country surprise party. It is rather loose in its construction, in truth, although there is fun in seeing the work of the second surprise party, ten orphans, who eat up the supper in the baskets. The value of the picture comes largely from the comedy and the romantic incidents that happen along the way. The story might have been easily made clearer. The photographs are often very pretty and some of the business is amusing, but the picture is only a filler.

"A COLLEGE GIRL" (Lubin), March 21.—Mr. Arthur Johnson and Miss Lottie Brisco play the leads in a very pleasing love story, which really makes the second half of this picture. A large part of the film is used before Mr. Johnson appears in the story (as a young but skilful doctor), merely in a statement of the situation, and this statement is markedly self-conscious—in its business and atmosphere, but not in its acting. The long braid of the leading lady accents this. The sets are simply perfect, and all of the scenes are very pretty indeed, in the "clear as a bell" photographs. We like the picture, but don't dare call it a sure feature—it will be a feature in most places.

"SAUL AND DAVID" (C. G. P. C.), March 22.—A masterpiece of coloring, this biblical picture tells a stirring and dramatic story that is very well known. Saul, King of Israel, knows that David is to follow him as king and tries to put him out of the way. Jonathan, Saul's son, loves David and saves his life. David finds Saul asleep in a cave and, instead of killing him, cuts off a portion from his robe. This convinces Saul that David is not conspiring to supplant him. The picture tells this clearly in outline, but the filling in is new and not according to the historical narrative in the Bible. The audience watched it with the closest attention, and seemed greatly pleased with it. It is a very sure feature picture. It has only one very commendable characterization, however; it is that of Saul. He is fine.

"A BUCKTOWN ROMANCE" (Kalem), March 22.—Darkies, a whole village of 'em, with an heiress-widow and two black swains, one of whom owns the barber shop. The whole atmosphere of this comedy picture is fresh and will surely please the usual audience, North or South; there are no white people in it at all. It seems to have been taken in a Southern village and also seems like the real thing. The photographs are very good indeed. We had a good time watching it and so did those around us. It's a feature comedy.

"A RECORD ROMANCE" (Essanay), March 22.—A dictograph is an office phonograph. The boss dictates to it all day long and the stenographer listens to it, while she writes afterwards what he has said. It was to such a record that the title refers. The picture shows a lively comedy, romantic and full of the right spirit and of good nature. The two leading roles are also very acceptably filled. The interest that the people take in a romantic picture like this depends very largely on the personality of the girl and man, because the young people (everybody is young while looking at a romantic picture) put themselves in one or the other of the leads, and it is well to have both very acceptable. In this case both certainly are. It will easily pass as a feature comedy. The photography is good.

"MR. BOLTER'S INFATUATION" (Vitagraph), March 22.—John Bunny plays "Bolter," a man who came to the city from a country town because a dancing girl (Miss Walker), told him, in fun, that she'd meet him there at the Hotel des Imbeciles. He lands in a police station and has to telegraph to his old friend (Mr. Eldridge) to come to town and get him out. Many people seem to think that Mr. Bunny is amusing chiefly because he is fat. It is because so many of his comedy pictures don't give him so good a chance to act as this does. In it he plays nearly the whole gamut of comedy emotions with the sincere earnestness that makes it a masterpiece. Mr. Eldridge (Bolter's grandfatherly chum), adds a good deal to it also; so does Miss Walker with her sprightliness; but Bunny is the ace of trumps. He gives us jolly laughter when he's sunny, and he makes us smile with sorrow when he's sad; but John Bunny's far more funny when he's found he's lost his money, and he's forty times more funny when he's mad.

"THE GYPSY SINGER" (Eclipse), March 20.—A picture with many highly artistic scenes and one that is acted by noted French players very well, indeed, at least in the parts of it that are consistently human. Its only weakness comes from the fact that it shows us a most heartlessly thoughtless act on the part of the picture's heroine, the Gypsy singer. It was inhuman ingratitude in her; she destroyed the masterpiece of an artist to whom she owed everything and merely because her pride revolted at its continual reminder to her and to the world that she had once been only a ragged Gypsy. Her old benefactor was driven almost crazy. Repentance came later, but it didn't, couldn't atone. The situation is competently handled, but the scenario doesn't permit us to be sympathetic with the girl, in spite of all that art could do, and the picture fails to get across powerfully. Yet many, nearly all of the scenes are lovely.

"THE TWO PENITENTS" (Vitagraph), March 20.—A strong, effective picture by the Vitagraph Western company, in which a wronged employee, for revenge, steals from his employer. Emma Goldman advocates this theoretically and Pittsburg Joe puts it in practice, but we never remember seeing it before in the pictures. The picture's point of highest interest comes several years after the "appropriation." The employer has failed and has become a bandit. The employee has repented and has sent his daughter with a letter and a large sum of money, more than he stole, as restitution. The bandit, with his gang, holds up the girl's stage. They take what money there is and the girl, too. It is an ugly situation (we don't intimate that this part of the picture isn't praiseworthy; it is), and one that gets over a hundred per cent almost. It is very effective. Some latent spark of manhood brings to the bandit a touch of revulsion when he sees the treatment the girl is receiving and he turns upon his confederates. He then finds the letter to himself and becomes repentant. After freeing the girl he repents still more and brings back the money to its sender and there's a short final scene, just enough to close the picture. It is a very good feature picture from the exhibitor's viewpoint, well photographed, tense and human.

"HOT STUFF" (Biograph), March 21.—A farce comedy, fairly entertaining throughout and affording one or two good laughs near its end. "Hot Stuff" is tobasco sauce, and a jilted lover who wasn't invited to the candy pull put it in the candy, cooling on the dry goods box under the window. His hated rival had made the fudge.

"A VOICE FROM THE DEEP" (Biograph), March 21.—This farce comedy on the same reel is even better than the former one; it is full of laughter. In a peevish mood our old comedy friend pushes his chum off the dock. They both are in bathing suits and the chum swims under the dock so that the man above thinks he is drowned. The photography of both reels is excellent and the release is desirable.

"THE ONES WHO SUFFER" (Selig), March 21.—It is the wives and children of course, and it is clearly set forth in this picture of an escaped convict who has been returned to prison after he had married and become a father. The picture is truly effective, but the whole drift of the story doesn't come out clearly until rather late in the film. This is not necessarily a weakness. There are two characters which, although barely outlined, are interesting studies. Both contributed to the tragedy. One is the sentimental old man who helped the convict and the other is the grasping man in fashionable clothes who betrayed him to the police for the reward. It is a good picture; but it will be admired more than liked. We call it a feature. Some of the photographs are lovely.

"THE TROUBLES OF THE XL OUTFIT" (Melies), March 21.—A farce comedy that kept the house laughing. A pretty trained nurse was called when one of the XL boys was injured. The fun in the picture comes from its showing of the efforts of the boys to keep her on the ranch. One man was willing to blow off his toe with a gun in order to make work for her. He missed, and that with its results was one of the picture's best laughs. The photography was not very good; yet clear enough. A good farce.

"THE DEFEAT OF THE BREWERY GANG" (Kalem), March 20.—A very well pictured political story with a brand new sensation. The story is good; it interests while we are in doubt as to the outcome, but it does not convince. The photographs are very good, many of the scenes are pretty. It will make a good filler.

"THE PRICE OF GRATITUDE" (Pathe), March 20.—An interesting but conventional story of the West. Roughly outlined it is this: The bad man saves the sheriff's daughter from the Indians and also keeps his very pretty wife from stabbing her. The wife, through jealousy, brings the sheriff to the hut and there he finds evidence that makes him arrest the bad man. Later he is set free by the sheriff's daughter who hands over the keys to the wife. The sheriff loses his job. The backgrounds in which this story is told are often very beautiful. The acting is nothing special in any scene and in some scenes it is poor. The photographs are fair, in one or two instances very good. It is a good filler.

"CUPID'S LEAP YEAR PRANKS" (Essanay), March 21.—A truly delightful farce comedy contained in the dream of a tramp. The kind spinster was getting the marriage license and the minister. While she was gone the tramp fell asleep under a theatrical poster and dreamed a very well acted and laughable love story, in which he and a very pretty actress figure as the principals. This burlesque of theatrical life is rich. Acting, mechanical work, sets, costumes, and photographs are all excellent. It is a very good farce feature.

"THE HOUSE WITH THE TALL PORCH" (Edison), March 22.—A dignified picture with distinguished settings and beautiful backgrounds (perhaps in Bermuda), which tells of the love of a lonely old man for his turbulent, unruly son whom he has driven from his presence, because of the boy's violent love for the young wife of a neighbor, his best friend. Toward the picture's close, the old gentleman is sick and the son returns. There are happenings in the margin of the story that are left obscure and at times, because of this, the main thread even seems broken. The acting of the chief players is good. The photographs are not up to Edison standard in all the scenes. It is a filler.

"INCIDENTS OF THE DURBAR AT DELHI" (Edison), March 23.—This is a collection of very interesting views of this great gathering in India and is well worth seeing. The two on this reel together make a good, desirable filler.

"TOMMY'S GEOGRAPHY LESSON" (Edison), March 23.—On the same reel with the above. We hoped that it was going to show in Tommy's dream an ideal and pleasant way of teaching geography; but it turned out to be a farce. Tommy dreams that he changes places with his father and makes his father study. There are one or two laughs in it.

"THE RIVAL CONSTABLES" (Pathe), March 23.—A rural comic character farce that a large audience found very laughable. The rival constables are a man and a woman. They are shown as out for chicken thieves. The scenes are mostly around the country store and around the coop from which the chickens were being stolen. The man cop puts red pepper on the chickens to make the thieves sneeze. The woman cop sees foot prints in the snow and measures them. She has the man cop, or thinks she has, just where she wants him and attempts to make an arrest. The man cop rolls down a bank to escape her and comes upon the real thieves. He gets one, and the woman the other. The audience seemed to enjoy it very much. It is well acted and well photographed, and will make a good, desirable filler.

"KARLBERG" (C. G. P. C.), March 23.—A very short film showing mostly the setting up exercises in use at the Karlberg War School in Sweden. The men are very expert at their work. The photographs are fine.

"THE DEPUTY'S LOVE AFFAIRS" (Essanay), March 23.—In this picture Mr. Anderson, with very competent support, plays a freshly interesting four-cornered story of love and jealousy. Beside himself as the deputy, there is the American sweetheart in sunbonnet and gingham dress, the senorita in Mexican costume and "Pedro." The senorita is the jealous one and excites Pedro to make the deputy think the sweetheart is untrue. We do not know who the lady is who plays this Mexican girl; but she is a very skillful actress in the heavy work that her part demanded. The photographs are poor; they seem muddy. The release is a good filler.

"PRESIDENT TAFT AND HIS CABINET" (Vitagraph), March 23.—The photographs are fair, but might have been better. We were glad of the chance to see the picture.

"HER FORGOTTEN DANCING SHOES" (Vitagraph), March 23.—A farce that shows many incidents quite impossible in real life. For the most part, the audience watched without any general laughter. In truth, it seemed to fall pretty flat. The first number on the reel, however, makes it a good and substantial release. Because of it, we call it a feature.

"THE GODDESS OF SAGEBUSH GULCH" (Biograph), March 25.—A good, interesting story, commendably sensational. It serves to contrast the characters of two sisters. The dark one, who comes on a visit to the sagebush, steals the sweetheart away from the light haired one, the "goddess of Sagebush." It was acted by all pretty well. The goddess is especially pleasing in this part. She is unique among picture players in the possession of hair that in the sunshine looks like a nimbus. Her acting also seems to be very popular. The story of the picture doesn't drag at all; the photographs are good enough and, although there are one or two minor points that might be called weaknesses, we call it a good feature picture.

"THE PRICE OF SILENCE" (Vitagraph), March 25.—A picture of a bad man and his mother, but one that is well made, extremely well acted and emotional. The mother is played by Mrs. Turner, mother of the Vitagraph Girl (Florence Turner) and there is a marked resemblance between them. The photography is good and the story is simple, direct and impressive. It is a good feature picture.

"HER UNCLE JOHN" (Lubin), March 25.—A farce in which a man who can make funny tumbles "makes up" as the Western uncle of a girl with whom he has fallen in love. He gets found out and then kicked out. It made the spectators laugh.

"HOODOOED" (Lubin), March 25.—Mr. Brown breaks a mirror and tries to get the hoodoo off on somebody else, succeeding at length with a Chinaman. We wish he had not tried it on a baby. The spectators laughed heartily and often.

"SONS OF THE NORTH WOODS" (Selig), March 25.—A winter picture with log cabin and backwoods store, dog sleds and snowdrifts. It tells a love story that is kept from being commonplace by pretty good acting and by interesting backgrounds. The action is very slow, except at moments; it is almost sleepy in parts. The photographs of snow scenes are bright, but fail to show faces clearly; the interiors are distinct but a bit misty. Its picture tells a human, acceptable story and can be rated as a fair filler.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 13" (March 25).—This weekly topical has a very large number of items and they cover a wide interest. There is a picture of Col. Roosevelt at Mineola when the counsel of a railroad recently challenged him as a juror; a striking miners' parade in Belgium; three or four steamship wrecks; the wreck of the 20th Century Limited near Poughkeepsie, N. Y.; scenes at El Paso, Tex., opposite to the much troubled Mexican city of Juarez; the delegates of the Lawrence, Mass. strikers at Washington and an impressive picture of a Greek Church ceremony before the monument erected near Moscow, Russia, to Napoleon's soldiers who died there. There are present several of the city councilmen of Paris.

"THE WRONG BRIDE" (Pathe), March 21.—A Mexican story in interesting backgrounds (park scenes in California) and with a stately marriage ceremony. The groom is seen going to the church with a cavalcade of his friends; the bride, in pretty wedding dress and veil, walks accompanied by her relatives and friends. The woman whom the groom-to-be had jilted lies in wait to stab the bride as she passes. She fails. The bride and her father hear her story and have her dress up and be married as the chosen one (under the veil). The chosen girl, after the ceremony, persuades the groom to accept his new wife. It is a pleasing picture, not a work of rigorous art. It is fairly well acted and pictured. We call it a feature, though with some doubt.

"THE JUNIOR OFFICER" (Selig), March 22.—A melodramatic love story with many pleasing scenes and some very good photographs. It is a story set for the most part on a steamship and is not very convincing. Mr. Hobart Bosworth plays the hero's part as the junior officer of the ship. He had loved the heroine, now married to a nobleman who is about to elope with an adventuress also on board. The junior officer saves the situation and reunites husband and wife. It is a picture with a sea breeze through it and seemed to be liked. We can safely call it a very desirable filler.

"RADGRUNE" (C. G. P. C.), March 26.—A glorious picture in many ways; it is beautifully colored and very well acted by skilful and pleasing players. Perhaps the picture's best quality is its truthfulness to the romantic tradition. In this, it is scholarly. It is not only a story costumed and played as in the Middle Ages; but is also a story that belongs to its time; it seems like an old story retold and not a modern story told in a background of moated castles, crowns, mantles of silk and satin, swords, armor and dungeons. We enjoyed it and every one seemed to enjoy it around us, except only as to the last ten feet which was gloomy and also seemed wholly unnecessary.

Radgrune is the daughter of a baron whose convoy is robbed by a powerful neighbor. She has a graceful dancing girl whom she sends to her enemy's castle to win the love of his son. This girl is successful. She drugs the young prince, admits the baron's adherents and the youth is kidnapped and carried to the barron's castle. Radgrune then falls in love with him. He escapes from the dungeon under a beautiful purple satin robe that she had bought. She is left alone in the cell and stabs herself.

"THE HOBO" (Selig), March 26.—A good, interesting picture, very well managed and well photographed. The Selig stock company which is led and directed by Mr. Hobart Bosworth very seldom produces stories that lack substantial human interest or fail to have a wholesome optimistic outlook. They often get a pretty convincing grip on that "good" that is in the worst of us. This picture does that and does it in a pleasing, strong way. Mr. Bosworth plays the "Hobo" in this picture so that we believe the story, although a man of his facial expression can't very well show the characteristics of a man "on the down grade." When he gets to be a tramp, and he certainly does get to be one, and has much grime on his face, he is convincing enough. This hobo fell from good estate and landed on the bottom; but at his death he showed that he had kept the hero stuff in him all the while. The audience liked the picture. It will make good as a feature.

"'ALKALI' BESTS BRONCHO BILLY" (Essanay), March 26.—This is another comedy dealing with these well known boys of a certain rollicking ranch in the West. It's a race picture. The girl promises to go to the barn dance with the man who can catch and take her from the saddle. There is a brisk, snappy race. "Broncho" catches her and thinks he wins; but finds he is mistaken. It brings a good hearty laugh out and everybody joins. The photographs are pretty fair. We call it a first class filler.

"REUNITED" (Cines), March 26.—A rather conventional and also modern story is told in this picture costumed as in the Middle Ages. The acting is not as good as in the best Cines pictures. The photographs are clear and the scenes interesting. The picture is hard on the eyes; it trembles.

"PISA" (Cines), March 26.—Gives good stereoscopic pictures of the Italian city not very far from Florence. The scenes are fairly well tinted.

"THE REVOLUTIONIST" (Lubin), March 23.—A Mexican story of a disappointed lover who became a revolutionist. He was a doctor. Later, he saved the life of the woman's baby and her husband, his former rival saves his life. This is one of the slowest pictures we have seen; it is fairly sleepy. Its climax is very unconvincing. The sets and costumes are nondescript. The photographs are good.

"THE LIGHTHOUSE KEEPER'S DAUGHTER" (Edison), March 26.—A well acted and commendable story of seafaring people. Miss Laura Sawyer plays the keeper's daughter who elopes with a sailor, a good man but one whom her father distrusts. He sails away and after a long wait is wrecked in a storm and is saved by the girl's father and her former suitor. The scenes, acting and photographs make this well managed and interesting story a substantial feature. It is not a very tense picture.

Independent.

"THE ANIMATED WEEKLY NO. 1" (Sales Company), March 13.—Here is the feature for Independent exhibitors. There is no picture that is so likely to be worth while as these animated illustrations of the world's most important events which is to come every week. It, in this first number, is a better picture than any other of its kind. There is a bit too much from Germany in this first issue, that is for the rest of the picture we mean. However, the general average for a year is of much more importance than the balancing of any one number.

Among the items there will be found the impressive military funeral of Gen. Von Haneke, the Kaiser is prominent in it as in another military item, the procession on the birthday of Frederick II. One of the most interesting items shows the members of the German Reichstag entering the assembly building. These portraits are very good. We also have a good portrait of the famous Countess of Warwick, of Dr. Wiley, and of a Marabout, village holy man, of Tripoli. There is a picture of a big German dreadnought and of a French submarine.

"IT PAYS TO BE KIND" (Eclair), March 19. A likable picture chiefly because it is well acted by players who are themselves pleasing and because it shows, although in a sentimental way, how a warm hearted little girl was rewarded. It doesn't convince; but makes up by leaving a pleasant taste. It is full of charming scenes. A rich aunt (Mrs. Stewart plays this role), pretends that she is poor and finds one of her four nieces more worthy than the others. It is not a very sure feature, but is well photographed and will make a desirable filler.

"IRELAND AND ISRAEL" (Champion), March 20.—A story of the pugilistic ring and of a Hebrew and an Irishman who were true friends. Ireland, the first of these, is a great fighter, but Abie's tactics in the ring made a roar of laughter. The mill in which Riley, the Irish friend, lost to his opponent, is refereed by Tom Sharkey. These scenes are very well photographed, as indeed the whole film is, and are very interesting. The story is good and very well acted and it was also watched enthusiastically. It is a good feature picture, good natured in its comedy and pleasing.

"THE TRAMP'S GRATITUDE" (American), March 21.—A lumber yard story in which a tramp is helped by the foreman and is then the unintentional means by which the dishonest watchman made it seem as though the foreman was a thief. The tramp explains and the true culprit is discovered. The action doesn't lag; but neither does it rise much above commonplace. The photographs are homely but interesting. It will make a fair filler.

"TAMING OF MARY" (Thanhouser), March 22.—A very amusing comedy in which a henpecked man and his termagant spouse are on a winter vacation trip in Florida. The husband meets an old friend and this man suggests a plan to tame Mary who, seeing the photograph of her husband embracing a dummy, falls into the trap. The photographs are very good.

"THE GOLF CADDY'S DOG" (Thanhouser), March 22.—A pretty picture telling a love story, many of whose scenes are on the golf links very near the old fort at St. Augustine, Florida. The darky caddy was the means of reuniting two lovers who had quarreled. The scenes, the simple, natural acting, the whole atmosphere of the picture are pleasing. The photographs are good. The release is well worth while; spectators will like it.

"NICHOLAS NICKLEBY" (Thanhouser), March 19.—A good picture; it is sure to be very popular and to be talked about; a good feature for several days' run. We have already reviewed it at length on page 858 of March 9, 1912.

"TENDER HEARTED MIKE" (Powers), March 19.—Mike was a burglar who broke into a house where the man and wife had quarreled about wife's mother's coming visit. Mike forced a reconciliation and while husband and wife were in each other's arms, ran off with the silver. However, they say that peace is better than gold or silver, so we count these young people fortunate. To say that such a picture is unconvincing would be foolish, because it is absolutely impossible; but there are one or two laughs in it. The photographs are fair.

"LIFE AMONG THE GYPSIES" (Powers), March 19.—On the same reel is this very interesting topical picture of gypsy life. It was probably taken in Europe, in Austria or Hungary. There are some fine character sketches in it.

"THE WORLD FAMOUS DANUBE" (Powers), March 19.—A series of glorious, stereoscopic views of the beautiful river Danube and its villages and towers. A very desirable offering. It sadly needs leaders to explain. All three are on the one reel.

"OVER A CRACKED BOWL" (Nestor), March 23.—It was just an ordinary bowl that got broken. The young husband passed his wife the crackers without looking up from the newspaper and the quarrel began. The young husband's chum came on a visit and, not finding either his friend or his friend's wife, made himself at home. A most pleasing comedy follows. The wife is played very acceptably by Betty Keller; the husband, by D. A. McDonald; the friend, by H. A. Lockwood. All are pleasing. The photographs are excellent. It makes a good comedy picture.

"SANTA FE, NEW MEXICO," (Nestor), March 23.—A distant view of the city is given and this is followed by some of the quaint city's buildings, old and new. The photographs are good, but might have been better, in the prints at least. It makes a very welcome release.

"OH, LISTEN TO THE BAND" (Lux), March 29.—A good trick film making, we almost said, a musical comedy, but it is a band comedy. The bandmaster got married and the instruments came of themselves to the wedding. It is a good picture, quite laughable at times, and well photographed.

"BILL BECOMES A FAVORITE WITH THE LADIES" (Lux), March 29.—On the same reel is this "Bill" comedy. This comic actor's fun-making is well known. The farce has a first class situation and is amusing, although a little on the rush and tumble line.

"THE BACHELOR AND THE BABY" (Nestor), March 30.—A pretty romantic comedy that opens with a rowboat scene in the harbor at San Diego, Cal. Mr. Harry Lockwood plays the bachelor who had just become engaged to a young lady (played by Miss Josephine Ricketts). Later his automobile and that of a pretty widow were both waiting at the door of the hotel. The widow's baby got placed in the wrong auto and the bachelor carried it away without noticing it. There was much trouble all around. The situation as shown has much probability, except the bachelor's taking the baby to his room. Perhaps he never would have been able to get it there. The final love scene with the bachelor making love to the widow (played by Miss Dorothy Davenport) is charming. We like the picture ourselves and the spectators seemed to enjoy it. The photography is perfect.

"WHO'S WHO?" (Powers), March 30.—The very pretty young cousin of an old maid is courted by a young man who has a double. That he was a double ought to have been told in a leader, plain as the pictures of the two make it. The situation when this double, an entirely different kind of man from the lover, takes his place, he being absent from the village, is very commendable. It was full of possibilities and a good many of these were brought out in this picture. It will be liked pretty generally. The photographs are fair and we risk calling it a feature.

"ON THE EVE OF AUSTERLITZ" (Eclair), March 31.—This beautiful film, made by the French company, is by George Desparbes, and is taken from the "Legend of the Eagle." It is not quite so artistic in its treatment as some of the Napoleon pictures we have seen, but in its sentiment and in its story, it is very acceptable. The picture is not very well named, for there is nothing in it to suggest the coming battle. No large bodies of soldiers appear on the scene; the episode alone furnishes the interest. The photography is clear, yet fails to give artistic feeling to the scenes. We call it a good feature, yet a little doubtfully.

"OUR BABY" (Imp), March 30.—A pretty, and well photographed picture, whose purpose is to educate. Good advice (we assume that it is), is given on the care of babies. The ladies in the audience liked it very much. The kid is very human and pleasing.

"SQUNK CITY FIRE COMPANY" (Imp), March 30.—On the same reel is this rural comedy. The suitor whom Pa doesn't like is elected fire chief and proves himself the village hero. Pa shakes hands. There is good comedy in it and many laughs. The photographs are good.

"THOU SHALT NOT" (Champion), March 27.—An amusing character comedy set in a country town and mostly in the parsonage thereof. The parson is caught breaking into his own house and the cops don't believe him. The minister's wife is a very well drawn character and furnishes most of the fun. The picture has a satirical intention, but we don't see that it hits a very definite mark. The photographs are very fair and we call it a filler.

"PHOTOGRAPHS, $5,000 EACH" (Ambrosio), March 27.—A flirtation farce comedy and detective story, in which a clever pair of swindlers (man and wife), fleece a rich man and his wife by leading both into flirtations, getting snapshots and later blackmailing them. It is a competently made and well photographed picture. The situation is somewhat vulgar. The detective tries, but fails to nab the swindlers.

"BROOMS AND DUSTPANS" (Eclair), March 28.—The lazy son of the bank president sold brooms in his own home district. It was a plan to get one over on father, who wouldn't come across with any more money. The picture's weakness is that it lacks human atmosphere, doesn't convince. It doesn't permit us to sympathize with any one in it. But the photographs, scenes, and much of the business in it are fine.

"FOR SALE—A LIFE" (Thanhouser), March 26. A rich clubman meets on the steamer going south to Florida an invalid and his wife. They are poor and the husband is dying of consumption. The clubman seems to be sophisticated and the invalid a selfish weakling. The outcome of the situation is left obscure, yet the picture seems on the whole very clean and wholesome. The backgrounds are on the steamer and in Florida for the most part. They are interesting and the photographs are excellent. We can call it a good feature picture although it is slight, because of its good characterizations and its photography. Miss Snow and Mr. Cruze play the leads.

"MY BABY'S VOICE" (Thanhouser), March 29.—A picture artistically made and very pretty; in it a mother, who is neglected by her busy husband, is tempted to be untrue, but is saved by her baby whose voice she hears over the telephone. This is fine and is made as convincing as can be. It was brought about by a little plot of a quick-witted and warm-heated telephone girl. When we say that Miss Marguerite Snow plays the mother, Miss Florence La Badie the telephone girl, and little Miss Helen Eline the child, and that all three play as well as they always do when playing a good situation, we have praised the picture highly. It is a very commendable, human release. The scenes, both those that are set and the exteriors, are well photographed and unusually pretty. It is a sure feature picture, one that can hardly fail to please everywhere.

"HIS DAUGHTER'S LOYALTY" (Powers), March 26.—To be old and, after years of toil, to find one's life work vain, is likely to place a man in a situation where love and loyalty of any friend or relative, if he has one, is to be prized. The old inventor thought that his invention was a failure when suddenly it proved a good success. The shock prostrated the man. A scheming manufacturer told him that it was valueless and later broke into the workshop to steal it. The old man hears him and a fierce struggle ensues, but the villain is confounded. The story is good and interesting. The picture is well made and acted. It is likely to be a popular feature.

"BILLY'S SHOES" (Solax), March 27.—A pair of hob-nail shoes cause their owner a great deal of trouble. He can't get rid of them. The quality of this snappy farce comes from the acting of Fanny Simpson and Billy Quirk, who play the leading roles. The photographs are fine. It's a good farce filler.

"A LIVING MEMORY" (Eclair), March 26.—A fine picture. To an old bachelor living in his dreams, the daughter of his old sweetheart comes as a ward. This girl looks exactly like her mother. She brings cheer and light into the musty house. At first this only shows the old man how bright things might have been and is too painful for him. But he nobly rises, like the fine old gentleman that he is, to what he things is required in the situation, brings young people in and encourages a love affair only to find that the girl loves not the man, but him. Mr. Francis, in his interpretation of the situation, keeps it highly poetical and makes it a commendable feature. The scenes and photographs are fine.

"ACROSS THE SIERRAS" (Nestor), March 27.—A story of friendship that interests and that convinces in spite of lack of probability. "Across the Sierras" was merely the place where the incidents pictured take place. The pictures are clear and the backgrounds are interesting. Mr. Jack Conway and Mr. Gebbart play the leading roles as two friends who are separated by a misunderstanding and reunited after twelve years. It makes a good, acceptable filler.

"WINTER SPORTS AND PASTIMES AT CORONADO BEACH" (American), March 28.—Coronado Beach is a very beautiful resort. This remarkable picture ought to be good for trans-continental passenger traffic. Moving pictures are likely to make Coronado as famous as the Riviera in the south of France. A picture very much worth while. Full length and very well photographed.

"A NIGHT'S ADVENTURE" (Champion), March 25.—A burglar comedy in which two darkies, who had broken into a house where three girls were alone, took them for ghosts and beat a hasty retreat. The girls called up three friends who, seeing them at a window, also took them for ghosts, causing some disturbance in the neighborhood. The farce is pleasingly acted, and although slight, is amusing. It is a fair filler.

"FIDELITY" (American), March 25.—An effectively pictured love story in fresh settings and showing the faithfulness of a wife to her husband in prison. It was suggested by one of the best told short stories that has appeared in the magazines recently, and gives Miss Pauline Bush a chance to give a new character interpretation. It makes a vital, human picture, a good feature. The types of mountain characters are interesting and clearly drawn, as is usual in "Flying A" pictures. The photography is very commendable.

"THE ANIMATED WEEKLY NO. 2" (M. P. D. & S. Co.), March 20.—A good number of short items rather than a few long ones are found in this week's animated picture of the world's events. The picture of widest general interest is the recent wreck of the 20th Century Limited near Poughkeepsie, N. Y., on the Central Railroad. The scope of the events shown covers a wide range of interest. One picture of an aeroplane rising from the sea is very interesting. The aviator's return to the water is very amusing. There is a military funeral in Paris, that of General Langlois. Another very interesting item is a picture of a sled driven, like an aeroplane, by fans. It goes fast and looks promising. We find among other items three new Paris creations in the way of evening gowns, a fine picture of Champ Clark with his son and daughter, the suffragists at Albany and a picture of the water carnival at Villefrance.

"ROMANCE OF A GAMBLER" (Nestor), March 25.—A gambler's love story with a good deal of pleasing freshness. He was deeply in love with the mine owner's pretty daughter and had hopes, for he was himself heir to a large fortune. The girl, however, loved someone else. This the gambler finds out and also that the other man is going the downward track. He saves him, to be the husband of the girl he loves, and does it in an unusually convincing way. We commend the picture as an interesting story and a safe feature. Many of the photographs are perfect, and the backgrounds very beautiful.

"AN EX-CONVICT'S ORDEAL" (Republic), March 26.—A wintertime picture with fine snow scenes, and showing adventures in the Alaskan gold fields. It's a love story, full of brisk action of the red blooded kind, usually found in Alaskan stories such as Jack London writes, for instance. The heroine is true to the honest, brave prospector even after she is told by an enemy of the man's prison record. It is well photographed, doesn't lose interest at any time and has thrills. It is a good feature picture of adventure.

"THE ETERNAL MASCULINE" (Majestic), March 24.—In this amusing picture Mabel Trunelle plays a comedy role that is consistantly off the beaten track. In the early scenes she is a convincing freak, the countrified gawk, very rich, whom the broker married for her money. In the latter scenes she is herself, the sparkling society woman with whom the broker, her husband (Herbert Prior), falls in love and whom she leads a pretty pace until he is half crazy with jealousy. It is a good, fairly fresh picture and in a good measure lives up to its title. The photographs are excellent. It is a very fair feature.

"SOCIETY FOR YOUNG WOMEN'S PROTECTION" (Great Northern), March 30.—The married man, Mr. Merry, told his wife that he had to attend a meeting of the society named in the title; but he was going to entertain his enamorata. Mrs. Merry was warned by a friend and various cleverly pictured complications came of it. The comedy doesn't drag; but it is very sophisticated and would never do for a church. The situation is one that can hardly be pleasant to the majority of spectators; it is a bit too vulgar.

"TEMPTED, BUT TRUE" (Imp), March 28.—A picture of a country blacksmith's sweetheart who, called by the lure of the city, left the little village. She is tempted, but remains true to her home training, and is saved from a schemer by the blacksmith who has come to the city to find her. There are some extremely fine smithy scenes in it and one beautiful fireside scene at home. Miss Vivian Prescott plays the girl and Mr. King Baggot the smith. Mrs. Hurley plays the girl's mother. All three do excellent work. The picture has much freshness and vim, but it isn't a new story. It ought to be acceptable as a feature in places where this theme hasn't been used too often. The photographs are good.

"A TRAGIC EXPERIMENT" (Reliance), March 27.—A thoroughly delightful picture with many of its scenes as natural as life. Miss Fernleigh plays in it an emotional role very strongly. She takes the part of an older sister who distrusts her younger sister's accepted beau. Miss Gertrude Robinson plays this younger sister as delightfully as usual and is especially so at one moment when she drums on the piano to tease her sister. The father of these girls is a chemist and the young man has become interested in a valuable new discovery of the old man's and is helping him sell it. While alone in the laboratory (a good set) the old chemist faints and is thought to be dead. The older sister accuses the young man of murder; but the younger sister proves him innocent. The chemist recovers. It is very prettily photographed and is a sure feature. These Reliance melodramas of late are very commendable. They are very artistic and yet are also very popular.

JOE BRANDT GOES WITH LAEMMLE.

For some months it has been rumored that Joe Brandt (Brandenburg), formerly manager of the New York office of The Billboard and at present advertising manager of the Dramatic Mirror, would join the Imp Films Company. Mr. Brandt says that his only reason for divorcing himself from the publication end of the film industry was because of the wide scope of operations afforded in the manufacturing center.

Taking with him, as he does, an intimate knowledge of the theatrical and amusement situation and having established an enviable record as a producer for both papers mentioned above, he should prove to be a valuable asset for the Imp Company.

Mr. Brandt will become part of the executive staff at the factory and will occupy a position of confidential relationship with Mr. Carl Laemmle personally.

NEW EXHIBITORS STARTING RIGHT.

Among the new equipments furnished this week by J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," the following are mentioned as those who have wisely decided to purchase the best without regard to price, where current controlling devices are concerned. Orpheum Theater, Lexington, Ky., one Hallberg 35 amp. D. C. economizer, 110 volts. Bathgate Theater, the Bronx, New York City, Hallberg Standard A. C. economizer. G. L. Babcock, Plainfield, N. J., Hallberg regular A. C. economizer. Mr. Hallberg reports a brisk demand for moving picture machines, opera chairs and other equipment for moving picture theaters.

Projection Department

Edited by F. H. RICHARDSON.

TO MANAGERS: Some time ago I started to give a series of talks to operators and managers, but the pressure on space was so great that the matter had to be dropped. I must, however, say a few words to managers and exhibitors on the subject of speed. Of course, I well know that I have already covered this subject pretty thoroughly a great many times, but it will stand repetition as long as there is a single speed maniac left—and there are still plenty of them, more's the pity.

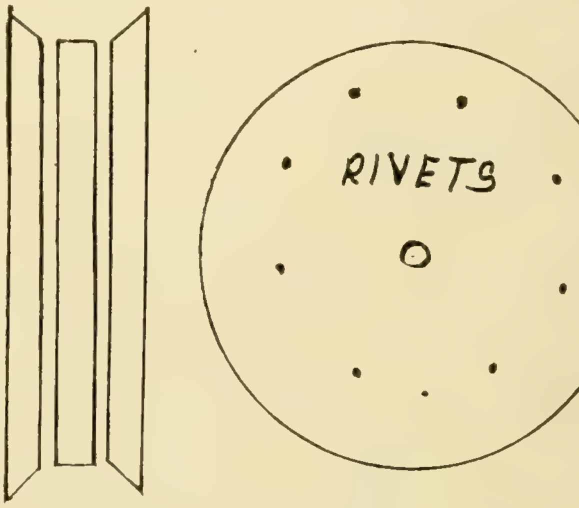
The moving picture is supposed to portray real life. It is the rendition, or repetition, of scenes actually enacted; usually by men and women, trained as actors, and presumed to know just how any given scene will look best. Now each act we do has its own peculiarity of motion. If we walk, the movement is not at all the same as when we run. It follows that if an actor walks across the stage, and then the film be run at over-speed it does not have the effect of making the actor run. Nothing of the sort. It merely causes him to move with quick, jerky, impossible movements, which are utterly ridiculous. I merely use the walking man as an example. This same thing holds true of practically the whole of any scene in which there are moving figures of men, women or animals. It therefore follows that the speeding up of the machine on such scenes utterly ruins their effect, provided always the speeding be carried too far. Without entering into question of damage to the film itself, let me appeal to your common sense—to your sense of obligation to the business to which you owe your living—to your sense of fairness to your operator, whom over-speeding compels to ruin his own work—to your sense of decency to your fellow exhibitor who will have to use the film after you get through with it—to your sense of fairness to the exchange which has paid more than $100 for the film you abuse, to stop, once and for all, the over-speeding of your projection machine.

The stock excuse for over-speeding is that the audience expects to see a certain given number of subjects, and that that number cannot be run in the time allotted to a "show" unless the machine is over-speeded. Let me say right here and now that if you cannot get business without abusing the films, prostituting projection, outraging your projection mechanism, and turning the products of the producers into a howling farce and ridiculous series of jumping-jack performances, then it were better, from any and every point of view, that you retired gracefully whence you came and leave the show business to those who understand it better. But I hold there is no such need for over-speeding. It will have to be proven to me that any audience—any audience, I said, mind you—would not prefer three reels properly and beautifully projected to four run through at racehorse speed. If the race-em-through managers would make a real effort to find out the possibilities of projection, and apply the knowledge thus acquired to the improvement of their own, they would soon find that the public are not such asinine idiots as they seem to imagine. Let those who are willing to be honest with their audience and not chop down the show when there happens to be a crowd, install a clock in plain view, preferably near the screen, and then advertise one hour's show, or whatever time it may be. The real trouble is that the average man or woman does not realize the passage of time when they are in a theater. When Mr. Chase-Em-Through slows down his machine and cuts out one of the reels, running the others as they should be run, the audience, while pleased at the improvement, imagines the time has shortened. It is not analytical and does not stop to consider, or does not know that it takes more time to run a picture right than to run it the other way. The audience knows the pictures have been vastly improved, but does not attribute it to the right cause. It has been vastly pleased by the improved performance and wants more, naturally resenting what it believes to be a shortening of the program time. Once let the audience understand the proposition and you will find them with you. If this is not so, it would have to be very thoroughly demonstrated to me. It is a shame; it is a disgrace and almost a crime to ruin the beautiful work now being turned out by our producers by running the films at racehorse speed. I certainly would like to see Exhibitors' Leagues, Exchange Men's organizations or Operators' Unions strong enough to stamp out this most pernicious practice.

WATERBURY, CONN., writes: "Have been interested in the discussion of direct current economizers (so-called motor generator sets) and notice that you have asked for the experience of users, etc. Over a year and a half ago I installed in my Scenic Theater, Bank Street, Waterbury, Conn., a Hallberg automatic direct current economizer, on 110-volt circuit. This has been operated continuously ever since, both afternoon and evening shows, without any interruption, saving me fully 50 per cent. on electric current bills, and I have the reputation of showing the brightest pictures in this section of country. My own personal observation is that they are a big improvement over running on rheostat. The economizer has given me no trouble whatever, and the only expense I have been to was $1 for a new set of carbon brushes. I would not operate this house now without the economizer. In my new Fall River house am installing a 40 to 60 ampere, A.C. to D.C. economizer."

I note that you say a "so-called" motor-generator set. You are in error there. The economizer is nothing more or less than a motor-generator, though the generator end is of a peculiar type, or winding. I am glad indeed to hear such good reports of this device. The saving ought to be about as follows: Assuming that you are using 40 amperes, that would mean, when using rheostatic resistance, 110 x 40 = 4,400 watts taken from the line. Of this you would use approximately 48 x 40 = 1,920 watts in the actual production of light, and waste 4,400 — 1,920 = 2,480 watts in the rheostat. With motor-generator set (I don't like these trade names since, from my point of view, they are confusing), having an efficiency of 100, there would be no loss at all. Motor-generator sets do not, however, have an efficiency of 100. It is a high class set which has an efficiency of more than 60 per cent. Mr. Hallberg claims an efficiency of 80 per cent, but with all due respet to that estimable gentleman I believe he is a little high in his figures. I would consider an outfit having an efficiency of 70 per cent as very good indeed. They only way to rightly test this matter is to have two absolutely correct volt-meters and two ammeters. Connect one voltmeter and one ammeter on the line side. Connect the other two instruments on the lamp side. When the arc is burning normal and the light just right, take readings on both sides. The difference in watts between the two sides will be the loss in electrical and mechanical friction. I have had a number of very excellent reports from users of Mr. Hallberg's D.C. economizer. I think there is no doubt but that it is a success.

INTERESTING LETTER. Texas (Name of town suppressed by request), writes: "As I stated in my other letter to the Department, that I would furnish a few more kinks, the first one will be for the benefit of operators in the smaller towns, who do not have the facilities of their more fortunate brothers who are close to a lathe or source of supplies. As shown in the sketch, pulleys of any size can easily be made, where needed for motor drive. The discs can be easily cut with a lantern chisel, and bevel-worked off with 8 or 10 inch wood rasp. Glue or shellac between inside and outside discs will make a stronger pulley. Can be fastened on shaft by drilling and tapping center disc and putting in set screw, or driving on shaft tightly, using resin or shellac, melted. ⅛-inch fibre board is used. Dimensions are for 3-16-inch round belt. For ¼-inch belt make bevel ¼ inch. Silicate of Soda of water glass is a fine thing to have in operating room. Where condensers are broken use a thin film of the soda on broken edge and press broken edges firmly together and dry under pressure. This will make them easily handled. I give the above for use in case of emergencies, where one has no new condenser on hand. Have frequently had to change broken condensers; one badly broken and the other only slightly so. By using above method had no trouble in handling. Silicate of Soda has a variety of uses which ingenuity of operator will discover. One word here in regard to a peculiarity of breakage of condensers I have experienced, i. e.: five condensers, all broken in a neatly straight line across lens and at right angles to flat side. Break as perfect as if cut with diamond. Am still using one. Crack does not show on screen when using stereo lens.



"You made a mistake in name of my engine; it is Hagan, not Hogan. I failed to give cost of outfit and running expense. Price for engine, pulley, belt, generator, volto-ammeter, $630. Expense 20 cents per hour with gasoline at 15 cents per gallon. As to 70-volt outfit, I was rushed for time and could only get 125-volt generator. Would have had trouble also getting fans for that voltage. 125-volt was better all the way around for my purpose than 70-volt, although would have effected an immense saving at rheostat with 70-volt. I would, with the same power, have been able to generate approximately 99 amperes at 70 volts, but in lowering voltage would have raised amperage at fans and arc. Also would have to use a larger size wire throughout. Other things being equal, I consider the 125-volt outfit better with the exception of loss at rheostat as you mentioned. A little more about care of commutators: I have seen crank twisters using motor-generator sets, holding sandpaper on commutator of generator while running with brushes in contact. A fine way to put things on the bum for sure. Small particles of copper and sand will stick to brushes and continue cutting process on commutator indefinitely. If you must use sandpaper, remove the brushes and clean brush holders and commutator thoroughly when done. For a sure method of smoothing commutator after using sandpaper, use powdered pumice and oil. Then clean thoroughly with gasoline, after which use the prepared chalk as mentioned in previous letter. Brushes need no particular treatment where commutator is kept free from dust, if they be kept at neutral point. In a 4-pole machine this can be found by lifting one brush from commutator at a time while load is on. If opposite brush sparks it is out of position and needs to be shifted until sparking ceases. When set perfectly no sparking occurs when brushes are lifted. As to that shutter proposition from Sullivan, Ill., you state that it is practically impossible. I had studied about that location of shutter for some time before Sullivan brought it up. I am not bull-headed, but I am going to work on it till I run up against your statement good and hard or get results. I want to give you a little incident here that occurred some time ago in a small town. Went into a show, having practically same generating outfit as mine. Operator was an electrician, but did not claim to know anything about projection. Found operator running with his carbons frozen and positive carbon on bottom and carbons set on the jack-knife plan. Light,—of course—(?). I straightened out his light and improved it some, but condensers were wrong for his throw (80 ft., with 14 ft. picture, Motiograph machine) and a nondescript screen, that had a penchant for absorbing a lot of light, made it impossible to get as fine a light as he should have had. No ammeter, so don't know arc consumption."

This letter is of interest. I hardly believe you will be able to evolve any practical scheme for placing shutter between condenser and aperture. As to the pulley scheme it seems to be entirely practical. I will freely admit that 110 volt current is more convenient in several ways, but the waste is too great, unless the percentage of current used for incandescent lights, fans, etc., is very heavy. That does not lessen the waste at the rheostat, but it makes it less in proportion to the whole and the convenience of using standard fans, lamps, etc., is considerable. You had me stumped with that waterglass cementing stunt for a moment. I see, however, that you use it merely to stick the two halves together for convenience in handling. Personally I don't think it pays to fool with a broken lens, except in emergency when one gets caught without a spare lens. Of course if the break is perfectly straight and at right angles to the surface it does no material harm to the M. P. projection and shows very little on the stereo We are obliged to you for the excellent letter.

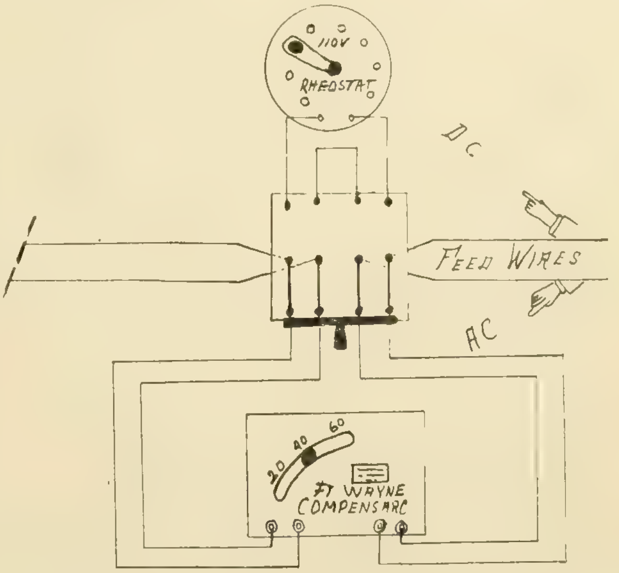
HIGH JUMPING, Shelby, Nebr., writes: "I notice in the March 16th issue of The World that you say in the Projection Department, bottom of column 2, page 966, that a 40 ampere D.C. arc through a rheostat consumes about 6 H. P. That hits me exactly. And I have to pay a very high rate for my juice. I run an average of fourteen hours a week, and my light bill is $8 per week. Could you advise me of any way that I can cut this expense? 110 volt D.C. Do you think that the economizers advertised in The World would help to amount to anything on a D.C. such as I am using? Expect to have A.C. some time in the summer. It will be carried about seven miles from another place and I think will be run through a transformer at a station here before it is delivered to the town for use. Am using at the present time 12 incandescent lamps in the house and 36 in front of building in sign and have paid as high as $39 in one month for juice for these lamps and machine. It seems to me that this is high jumping. Any suggestions cheerfully accepted."

Yes, that seems to be "high jumping" all right. You did not say what c. p. your sign lamps are. Possibly you might reduce current consumption by using 4 or 8 c. p. lamps for your sign. I believe if I were in your place I would carefully investigate the Detroit Moving Picture Electric Light Plant (see adv. on P. 1103, March 23 issue). I have many excellent reports on these plants. Mr. Hallberg's D. C. motor-generator set (Economizer) is also giving good results. There is also a similar set put out by the Fort Wayne people but I have had few reports on it and the Ft. Wayne people will have to convince me their set is O. K. before I can recommend it. Mr. Hallberg's, I am convinced, is all right and will deliver the goods, except that I cannot vouch for the correctness of his figures as to efficiency. But there is no doubt but that it will effect a considerable saving at any rate—possibly as much as he claims, viz., 50 per cent. Would advise that you investigate both Mr. Hallberg's and the Detroit Engine Works proposition carefully.

NEW CARBON STUNT.—Ft. Worth, Tex., writes: "Brother Gregory is perfectly right when he asserts that he is able to get a better light with carbons soaked in brine. It is an old trick. Have used it for years, but it won't work with all makes of carbon. Now here is one for D. C.: Take 1 oz. bichromate [don't mean bicarbonate do you? Ed.] of soda, 1¼ gills of boiling water. Dissolve soda in the water and let cool. Then, while slowly stirring, add ¾ oz. of sulphuric acid. The acid must test at least 65 degrees (Baume). Lay carbons in the mixture from one to two hours, remove and allow to get thoroughly dry before using. Use ⅝ cored above and ½ inch solid below, the latter to be dipped, but the ⅝ carbons not to be. I have 110 to 115 volt current. Use 35 amperes to project a 12 ft. picture 61 feet. Next door is a mirror screen. Mine is plain aluminum. I have the best picture, though he uses 50 amperes on a 12 ft. picture at 78 feet. Of course, a lot depends on the individual operator, when it comes to using such things."

Very likely, Ft. Worth, it is your lack of experience in writing, but I don't quite "get" you. As I understand you, the top carbon is not to be soaked at all—just the ½ inch solid, lower carbon. I would strongly advise anyone trying this to first have a batch of it mixed by a druggist. Sulphuric acid is an extremely dangerous thing to fool with unless you know precisely what you are doing. If the druggist says the mixture is all right as it is given, well and good. It doesn't seem to me, however, that you would have enough of the mixture to soak many carbons. As to the comparative results, if you can approach the same results as are obtained with a mirror screen, the mixture certainly is a wonder. However, I must question some of your statements. In the first place the man who would use 50 amperes D. C. on a 12 ft. picture, projecting same on a mirror screen, is either totally incompetent or crazy. Twenty-five or thirty amperes would be ample. I thank you, in the name of the Department fans, for the carbon-soaking receipt, even though advising that it be used with caution. Those Bijou Dream days in Chicago are quite a spell back. Glad to hear from you, nevertheless.

UNIQUE WIRING SCHEME.—Clayton, N. J., writes: "I read quite a number of interesting novelties in the Department. Will now contribute a small one I once ran across in a little Jersey town. The current was supplied by the glass plant, and, during the day, and until 9 P. M. was 110 volt D. C. After that it changed to 110 volt A. C. The company refused to allow us to use A. C. through rheostat as it pulled the lights in nearby stores down and the merchants put up a big kick. The manager (owner also, by the way) purchased a Ft. Wayne Compensarc and I devised the wiring as per sketch, it seeming to be the least troublesome to operate.



"I have tried out Gregory's plan of soaking the carbons in brine and the result proved quite satisfactory. Where I am now working, we have 220 volt A. C. I could not get along with 20 amperes but got a better light than usual with 40; so much so that patrons spoke of how bright the picture was and Manager asked what I did to get such improvement in results. I find the Handbook to be a friend in time of need every time. The World is also a most welcome visitor each Tuesday."

The wire scheme could scarcely be improved upon for the purpose. It is unique also. The only drawback is that four-pole, double-throw switches are ordinarily only to be obtained of large dealers. However, two double-pole, double-throw switches would do practically as well. For that matter they could be mounted side by side and the handlebars be fastened together rigidly with a bar of fiber, provided one cared to take that bother. As to the brine stunt: I had a sort of ingrowing idea that there was something in Brother Gregory's stunt. I had a suspicion he hadn't told me quite all there was to it, however. Looking back at the comments I have made I think you will all admit that I came remarkably close to it, considering that I was only guessing at it.

GHOST.—Clarion, Ia., writes: "Am having trouble with my light. There is a black spot in the center of the screen, same being about two feet in diameter. Cannot get it out."

You give no information as to size of picture, throw, or focal length of condensers. How then, do you expect that I can reply intelligently to your inquiry? Try moving your lamphouse forward and ahead—not the lamp, but the whole lamphouse. If this does not accomplish the desired results change your condensers for others of different focal length. If your projection lens is less than three inch E. F. very likely two 6½ inch condensers will be best. If your projection lens is between three and four inch E. F., most likely one 6½ and one 7½ condenser lens, the latter in front, will be best. If your projection lens is more than four inch E. F., you will probably get the best results with two 7½ inch condensers.

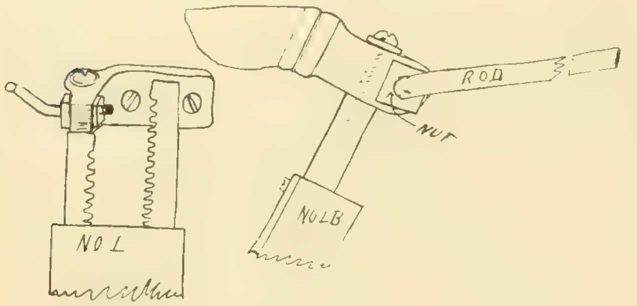
SHOCKING.—Norwood, O., writes: "Will you tell me whether or not it is possible to tighten the connections at rheostats while the arc is burning, without receiving a shock. I have learned half what I know about projection from experience and half from your Department."

You can easily tighten rheostat connections by standing on a piece of dry board, or by using a pair of pliers, the handles of which are wrapped with insulating tape, or even by wrapping a piece of paper around the handles of a pair of pliers; assuming, of course, that the voltage does not exceed 220. A piece of dry board or an ordinary wooden chair will insulate you for that voltage. The operator is frequently called upon to handle live wire connections. The best method of accomplishing this, ordinarily, is to wrap the handle of one of your screw-drivers, and its blade down to within one-half inch of its point with insulating tape; also wrap the handles of at least one pair of pliers with tape. You can then handle wires carrying voltage up to 220 with impunity since the tape prevents the current reaching your hands.

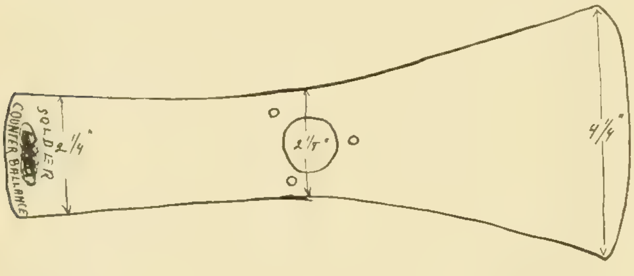
TORN FILM.—Crossett, Ark., writes: "Enclosed find piece of film with sprocket holes, or, I might say, one side of film torn loose. We have recently installed a Power's No. 6 and this has happened two or three times. We have been unable to locate the trouble."

In the first place the film is either quite old or else has been badly used. The trouble does not, I think, lie in the machine, but in the film itself. However, there are two things possible which might help to produce this kind of damage: (a) emulsion on the tension shoes combined with too much tension; (b) the intermittent sprocket not square with the camshaft, thus throwing all the strain of the film-pull on one side of the sprocket, which in this case would be the right hand side—in other words the right hand side of the intermittent sprocket lower than the left hand side. To remedy this it would be necessary to readjust the two bushings which carry the intermittent sprocket shaft. As regards tension you should only barely have enough to perform the work of stopping the film and holding the picture steady over the aperture during exposure. Loosen up the tension until the picture begins to climb on the screen when the crank speed is increased to about 90 per minute.

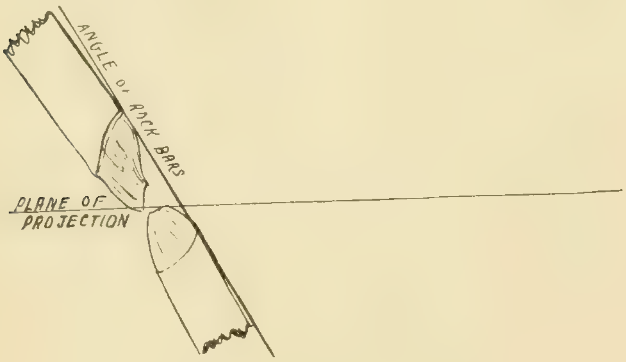
EXCELLENT LETTER.—Calexico, Cal., writes: "Have a Powers Six, 112-foot throw, 8-inch Bausch & Lomb M. P. lens, and 28-inch B. & L. stereo with 2½-inch lens diameter. Picture, 14-foot Kimball motor drive, Fort Wayne compensarc. Condensers, 6.5 x 7.5, but are not extremely satisfactory. What focal length would you recommend? Furthermore, I have an operating room, asbestos lined, size 10 x 10, with 5 x 10 skylight, and a big double window in front, which opens on the street. In recent issue I note communication from La Grande, Ore., regarding sidewise regulation of arc, while in operation. I have used such a scheme for the past year and find it very convenient at times, though with the use of good carbons, and careful adjustment of same at the start, I seldom need to use the adjustment. It is illustrated in No. 1 and No. 1B, of accompanying sketch.



"As to opening in rear of lamphouse, of which you spoke in your reply, to allow adjustment rod to stick out, I always leave whole back of lamphouse out. This ought to be done wherever possible. By so doing I have yet to crack my first condenser. I have noticed much comment regarding use of two and three-wing shutters on 60-cycle A. C. I cannot use a three-wing shutter at any speed, owing perhaps to the habit my voltmeter has of wandering all over the face of the dial. It runs all the way from 95 to 125, never remaining at the same spot for more than one consecutive minute. However, I made a two-wing shutter which gives such entire satisfaction that I am sure no three-wing, under the most favorable conditions, could do better. Weight (solder) is put on small blade for counterbalance.

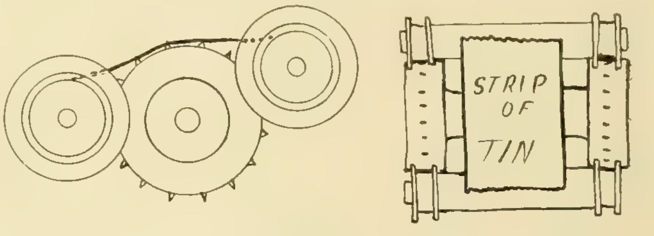


"Regarding the electrolytic rectifier, they give fair satisfaction where only a small amount of current is used, such as operation of small, wireless coils, etc. In their present state, however, they are hardly adapted to the rectification of projection current. Attached find sketch of my method of setting carbons for A. C. Securing and maintaining craters in this shape was only accomplished after a great deal of experimenting, both as to setting and "make" of carbon. I find ⅝ Bio, No. 10, 610, to be best.



Sketch shows exact angle at which I carry my carbons, and the usual appearance of the craters. Carbons are not quite parallel with rack-bars, you will notice, both angling away a little. Still another matter which I wish to bring up is the losing of the lower loop by film jumping off lower sprocket. As I before said, I have a Powers Six. I have eliminated the trouble by means of a very simple expedient. As you see by sketch it consists of a strip of tin about ⅝-inch wide, bent slightly and soldered to the lower sprocket idler rollers. It passes over sprocket just below end of teeth, so that film does not touch it except when it jumps. It absolutely prevents the film from leaving the teeth.

"There seems to be some misunderstanding regarding so-called economizers. They are simply step-down transformers, economical because they transform useless surplus voltage otherwise consumed in rheostat in the form of heat, to additional useful amperage, thus lowering the line watt-consumption. The Fort Wayne compensarc, which I have, delivers a secondary voltage of 55, with 25, 45, or 62 amperes, as desired, by simply moving a switch handle over to its respective position—contacts are enclosed. There is no waste in heat and they are money savers. A manager who will do without them in this day and age has no regard for his operator's comfort, and has no eye for business, as the rheostat is simply a hole in which he is slowly dropping unnecessary dollars. A correspondent some time ago asked for the address of Underwriters at Los Angeles—it is 318 Security Building."



I was really provoked at this brother. He made very excellent sketches. They were excellent indeed, BUT they were all done in pencil, hence it all had to be done over. You have about a 7½ e.f. projection lens, and most certainly at least two 7½ lenses should be used. You surely have a dandy operating room. In that respect you are indeed fortunate. With all due respect to you, Calexico, I've no faith in that shutter of yours. If it would work, and not give flicker, it would be great for it cuts a very small percentage of the light indeed. But ???? The crater position and shape is ideal for A. C. I never was able to get it quite that good myself, though I'll undertake to come pretty close to it and keep it that way all the time, too. The idler bracket scheme I cannot commend, if I rightly understand it, for the reason that it stops the rollers from revolving, and they would very soon wear flat on one side. Of course, though, if it works satisfactorily after an extended test I have nothing to say. The nature of an economizer has been set forth in these columns many times, as well as in my handbook. However, there are two kinds—the kind which is a straight step-down transformer and the auto-transformer. In the former there is no mechanical connection between the primary and secondary. In the latter there is. I shall be glad to hear from you at any time.

?????????—Homeworth, Ohio, writes: "With a light, the outside diameter of which is 1½ inches, what size condensers ought I use to get proper size spot at the cooling plate? Distance from condenser to aperture 14 inches."

I am not sure that I grasp your meaning. The size of the spot does not depend on focal length of condensers, but on the distance of the light itself from the condenser. If you are using some kind of light which has itself a diameter of 1½ inches, I shall have to refuse to be interviewed. I am of the opinion that a standard condenser, having a diameter of 4½ inches, would only utilize a small percentage of such a light. I believe that only a space on the luminant about ½-inch in diameter would be of much value in producing projection light. What the effect of a lens of larger diameter, of any different, I am not prepared to say. Better make your proposition a little more clear. As to the firm name you ask for we have been unable to locate same.

HALLBERG D. C. ECONOMIZER.—Mr. Geo. M. Krupa, proprietor and manager Hippodrome and Dreamland Theaters, Lancaster, Pa., writes: "I have been using one of J. H. Hallberg's D. C. economizers for the past two years and a half and in that time have spent $6 for brushes, and not another cent for any other repairs. It runs constantly from 7 to 10 hours a day 6 days a week. The light is brighter, steadier, and seems to be more evenly distributed than when using rheostatic resistance. It saves me about 40 per cent. on my former light bills. We have had no trouble in the operation of this machine. In fact, my operator prefers it to a rheostat. We are supplied with 110 D. C. I would be pleased to show this machine in operation to anyone who might be interested."

I am not printing this letter to "boost Mr. Hallberg's game." It is rather an unusual proceeding to print such letters, but I regard the throwing out of the rheostat, with its waste, as of such importance that I am willing to give space to letters proving that there is a device capable of accomplishing the reduction of D. C. voltage and which at the same time is practical from any and every point of view. I have personally examined several of these outfits and talked with operators running them. I have at last become convinced that they are thoroughly practical and to be recommended. Of course, they do not save all the waste, as their efficiency is not more than 80 per cent., if that. But, even so, the heat of the rheostat as well as much of its waste is eliminated. With 220 volts the saving would be enormous as against rheostatic resistance.

CANNED PROJECTION.—Salt Lake City sends in clipping from the Salt Lake Evening Telegram, March 18 issue, asking what I think of it. The clipping gravely relates that a firm to be known as the Automatic Stereopticon Company, of Salt Lake City, is to be formed for the purpose of manufacturing and marketing a device, the invention of a Salt Lake man who went insane immediately he had finished the device, designed to be attached to moving picture machines. It is claimed that it will automatically do all reel-shifting and other work now performed by the operator, hence displace him.

Don't be alarmed, Salt Lake. You'll hold your job quite some time yet, if you wait to be "displaced" by an automatic device. Undoubtedly the reels could be shifted automatically and possibly even the machine could be threaded. Maybe the carbons could be re-set and wire-ends be repaired when they burn off. Perhaps an automatic device could be perfected which would even—but pshaw! What's the use spoiling good paper and wasting valuable space on nonsense. It is quite likely that the newspaper has simply gotten the whole thing twisted, as newspapers usually do when attempting to speak of anything even remotely pertaining to moving pictures, and that the fact is that the device is merely something designed for advertising purposes. There are already several such devices on the market.

MORE TROUBLE.—Syracuse, N. Y., writes: "Have two Power's Six machines. There is a grind in one of them. It seems to be in the gear next to the camshaft on the balance wheel side. I am not very well acquainted with the mechanism and would like you to tell me what adjustment I should make."

You should immediately send 10 cents in stamps for a copy of the January 6th issue of The Moving Picture World in which appears photographic instructions for the adjustment of the Power's Six machine. This will give you all necessary information. Meanwhile be sure that the sliding bar which holds the gear in question is not loose in its ways. If it is, loosen the two screws which hold the gib on its right side, and in behind the rim of the gear which meshes with the gear the sliding bar carries, you will find two set screws. Tighten these set screws until the lost motion in the sliding bar is eliminated. Don't get them too tight or you cannot move your framing carriage.

PROJECTION INFLUENCES.—A gentleman, whose business it is, in part, to analyze such matters, has written me saying that apparently the quality of the picture and the amount of current required for such quality, is influenced by the following: Setting of carbons, size of upper carbon, size of lower carbon, kind of screen, two or three-wing shutter, size of picture, length of throw, amperes at the arc, character of house lighting during projection; that is whether indirect lighting, green shades, or approximately full lighting; atmosphere and density of film.

This is perhaps the best analytical statement I have ever seen of this particular proposition, except that I cannot agree that, given a reasonably clear atmosphere, the length of throw makes any appreciable difference whatever. Aside from this, there is nothing in the list which does not have a very large bearing on projection. Particularly do I wish at this time to call the attention of operators to the fact that the size of the carbons, as re laed to the amperage used, is a matter of very great importance. It is a matter to which altogether too little attention is paid. We find an operator using ⅝ cored carbons above with 45 amperes D. C. in one house; and we find the same operator using 25 amperes in another house (at another time of course) and the carbons are still ⅝. This is wrong. The size of the carbon should be varied with the number of amperes used, particularly with D. C. I am not sure whether this holds good with A. C. or not, as I have not experimented in that particular. I should be very glad indeed to have operators make careful exhaustive tests of the effect of carbon size and report. My own view is that, for instance, 25 amperes D. C. should be used through a ½ inch cored carbon above, and either a 7-16 or ⅜ solid below. I will admit I have not tried these sizes of carbon below. I have, however, tried ½ inch cored above and ½ inch solid below, using 25 amperes, and find them to be much better than ½ inch solid below and ⅝ cored above. This is another one of the matters to which we must now proceed to give our attention, and experiment until we find exactly what is right and best for the various amperages. The density of the film, of course, we have not control over, and the size of the picture is usually arbitrarily fixed by the management. The screen is sometimes, within certain limits, under the control of the operator as is also the house lighting. I have not the space to devote to this subject, at this time, which its importance demands. However, there is food for much thought and study in the list given. I shall hope to receive some letters on this topic, since it opens up a very wide field.

WIRE TERMINAL.—Illinois (name of town suppressed), writes: "The motor is pulling nicely and the light is good, the film in excellent condition. There is nothing to do but change reels every fifteen minutes, so I will take up some of your time because I have some of my own to spare. I have been working (or is it play?) for my present boss for about three years. I have seen a few different ways of fastening the wires to lamp set forth in the Department, but have seen nothing like mine. I would not think of looking at the connection oftener than once in six months; in fact, I have only renewed them once in the two and a half years since I first put them on; but the second renewal is about due. I only draw 30 amperes D. C. I removed the covering from 7 in. No. 6 asbestos covered, flexible wire, opened up four inches from the end of the wire and bent it back and wrapped it around the remaining three inches. I then put the new end into a copper terminal such as electricians solder to wire ends where they fasten to switches, etc. It is a copper tube, outside diameter ½ inch and half its length is flattened out; it is 1½ inches in length over all. Instead of solder I hammered the tube as solidly around the wires as I could. The result is it keeps in good condition for a long time."

Now my brother, while I appreciate your kind letter I am going to "land on you." In the first place you say the motor is pulling nicely, the film in good condition, etc. Therefore you have spare time for letter writing, while the machine runs. That doesn't sound good to me. It is exactly on this account that I have discouraged the installation of motor drive. There are no circumstances that I know of where an operator can possibly have any spare time while his machine is running. I don't care how much experience he has or if he has been running a machine for three hundred years, his eyes should be glued to that picture every instant of time it is on the screen, and his whole attention be given to the perfection of his projection. As regards your terminal stunt, I see no reason why it should not be all right except that inasmuch as copper oxidizes under the influence of heat I very much doubt the possibility of leaving your wires without attention all that time and not having them develop a great deal of resistance, even though you may have the back entirely out of your lamp house. I imagine that if you took those wires off and substituted new ones you would find a very decided improvement in your light. I imagine that an ammeter in circuit would show a jump of from 5 to 10 amperes upon the installation of new wires. This would mean that you are wasting that much energy in the resistance of your old wires. As for myself, I would cut off these wires at the back of the lamphouse once a month, if not oftener. This would waste about twenty cents worth of wire, but will, in all probability, save you a great deal more than that in energy dissipated in overcoming the resistance of the old wires; that is, provided you are on meter, of course. Now, my brother, do not get angry, because I have talked to you thus. Consider what I have said carefully and I believe you cannot but concede that I am not very far from right.

NAUGHTY GHOST.—Mr. Carey Wilson, manager Criterion Theater, Rutherford, N. J., writes: "Have been having some difficulty with a ghost and want to find out what size condensers you think best adapted for our purpose. Throw, 106 feet; picture, 16 feet; current, 220 volts, A. C.; Power's Six machine, with Hallberg economizer. Ghost appears in center of picture and occasionally at top. No amount of shifting or adjusting seems to remove it permanently. Use ⅝ Electra carbons. Can you tell me what size condensers we need?

"Our house is, we think, just about the best ever. Seating capacity, 700. The front half is reserved. All draperies, carpets and decorations by Arnold Constable, of New York. Stage 50 by 32 feet. Mirroroid screen used. Our operating room is one of the finest I have ever seen. Size, 22 by 15 feet. Solid concrete floor, walls and ceiling. Separated from the auditorium proper by a concrete and fireproof tile wall sixteen inches in thickness, through which no fire could ever burn. Clean our reels every day with Mortimer cleaner and this and the rewinding is all done by electric motor. Telephone from operating room to stage. Thirty-inch ventilator directly over lamphouse. Workbench and full equipment of tools for any repair job. Running five reels of Licensed pictures and one, sometimes two, vaudeville acts, for ten, twenty, and twenty-five cents. While on the subject of films, I want to say a word on the exchange problem. We are dealing with the Actograph branch and our relations with them and particularly Mr. Etris, have been of the best. Have had no trouble of any kind and Mr. Etris certainly exerts himself in looking after the exhibitor's interest. Are running a series of popular player nights. Had Mr. John Bunny out here on the 13th and the town went wild. The street was blocked on both sides of the theater and we could have filled the house a dozen times. Played absolutely to capacity all evening. Mr. Costello comes on April 9th, and expect a duplicate of Bunny Night. Expect to install another machine to avoid delays in threading up. But never allow show to be cut or reels to be run through in a rush, no matter how many people are waiting to get in. Wish you would come out and look us over. We are only fifteen minutes out of New York on the Erie. I think you would find it well worth the trip to see what we have out here 'in the country,' as Brother Sargent says. So pay us a visit and bring Sargent with you. He has promised to come out and pay a call."

As to condensers: It is possible the trouble is due to spherical aberration. Try two 7½ lenses of better grade. Condenser focal length is a puzzling thing. What fills the bill in one instance doesn't seem to do at all in another. Two 7½ lenses ought to fit your case. If it doesn't you will simply have to experiment until the right combination is found. However, first get two 7½ lenses of better grade, to make sure it isn't spherical aberration. I will try and visit you soon. Would bring friend Sargent along, but honest I'm afeard. He might kidnap me if I went alone with him over into the wilds of New Jersey. He's real jealous of me, anyhow, and I have to be very careful. I certainly must see that operating room of yours. Yes, you certainly ought to have two machines.

SALT BRINE A SUCCESS.—Mr. L. A. Young, vice-president the Auditorium Amusement Company, Norwich, Conn., writes: "Note in issue of March 23 you ask for opinions on the 'Salt Brine' stunt for carbons. This is my first offense, so let me down easy. I gave the idea a pretty thorough tryout, and was not disappointed with results. We use Fort Wayne compensarc, 110 volts, 60 cycles, A. C., and ⅝ Bio cored carbons. I first soaked the carbons three days, and dried them three days; results not altogether satisfactory, but I think the fault was they had not dried enough. I then soaked them in a stronger solution of brine for about 5 days, and dried them a week; result, quite a little better. There is considerable flaming, when the arc is first struck, but they generally settle down after a few minutes burning. I then tried using one carbon on the bottom that had been soaked, and one on the top that had not been soaked, and the results were very good indeed, as the light was very white and soft—very much like D. C. I do not think that it is possible to project a very good picture with only 20 amperes however; anyhow not in my case. I have an 87-foot throw, and picture is 18 feet wide. On the 60-ampere contact of the Compensarc there is a tendency to needling, but not bad enough to do any harm. I have found it is absolutely necessary to file all carbons that have been soaked; that is, to roughen both the sides and tip of the carbons; also file the carbon holder at every trimming, as the salt makes a bad contact and sometimes it is impossible to strike the arc. Best results on 40-ampere contact. No trouble here at present; broke one condenser in three years. Use Power's Six. Get good results all round, but still looking for better, willing to tackle any new stunt that comes out. That old gag, 'If it's good enough for dad, it's good enough for me,' doesn't go a cent's worth with me. Have got many good ideas from the Department, and have my 'eagle eye' skinned for more."

There is no "let me down easy" coming on such an excellent letter, Brother Young. I might say that Mr. Young went to Norwich three years ago as an operator. He is now vice president of the company. Whether he has given up active work as operator I don't know. Well, it seems that the best results to date come from soaking the lower carbon only. That was what took my eye with Brother Gregory's light—the soft, white light very closely approximating D. C. effect. No, you need not hope to get good results on 20 amperes for an 18-foot picture. That would mean less than .1 of an ampere per square foot of curtain area, where it should be almost .2 if D. C. were used.

PECULIAR TROUBLE.—Kans., (name of town suppressed by request) writes: "I wish to ask some questions, and give a bit of my experience. I work for a live manager who, although new at the game, having only had eight months' experience in the business, knows when the proper results are on the screen. He promptly procures anything I may need to better my work, as well as any needed repairs. I have two Power's Six machines, driven by ¼ h. p. motors. Use two motiograph lamps and lamphouses, which we think are the best made. Have compensarc now, but have ordered a mercury arc rectifier. There is a dark wave across the picture. It is noticed more on light background, but can be seen on all of the pictures unless I run the machine 60 per minute. More than 60 takes it all off. I removed the three-wing shutter and substituted a two-wing shutter of my own make, but it does not overcome the difficulty. What is my trouble and how can I remove it? If I run slow on pictures requiring slow speed, the waves get larger and darker every time I change speed, and that is why I am up against it, for it flickers; not a travel ghost mind you, for the picture is sharp and is outlined perfect. Which, in your estimation, is the best and cheapest, Mercury Arc Rectifier, or a motor-generator set? Now I will give my experience in adjusting the idler rollers and tension springs. I set the idlers just so they are even with the top of the sprocket teeth. I find the film will not be damaged any if it jumps off, because the roller gives some and lets the film slip back without punching the teeth into it, and the guides keep it from getting off the sprocket. My tension springs are so loose that I can pull the roller away back from the intermittent sprocket while the machine is running and the film will not leave the sprocket, yet the picture is steady."

As regards that "wave" proposition, the only possible explanation I can see is that you run your films very slowly and the effect which you call a wave is really a flicker. However, this ought to be much worse with a two-wing shutter than a three-wing, so I don't know what to think. You will have to describe that effect more closely before I can help you. As to the Mercury Arc Rectifier and motor-generator set, we cannot, for very obvious reasons, draw comparisons of this kind in these columns.

As to the idlers, I cannot commend your scheme, though it may work all right if you run at very low speed. Idlers are designed to be, and should be, set away from the sprocket by about twice the thickness of a film.

OPAQUE COATING.—New York City writes: "In a recent issue of The World someone asked for or gave a formula for coating slides with whiting. In answer you said that, while the process was good and cheap there might be trouble experienced in getting the coating right so that the whiting would not come off when writing on the slide. The formula is all right just as it is. Paint the slide with a brush and then dip it in a pail of clean water and lay flat on a table until dry. This removes the surplus glue and leaves the slide evenly coated. I have made my slides in this manner for two years and have never had the least trouble. Am sending sample slide that you may see how nicely it works. I make cartoons for all titles and announcements. Of course, they must be appropriate to the subject. There have been many articles written on alleged motion picture machine "explosions" in the past. Of course, when they appear in an ordinary newspaper there can be but one answer, viz.: ignorance. But when they blossom forth in the columns of no less pretentious publications than the Billboard, which devotes space each week to moving picture affairs and which claims to represent the industry, what are we to think? What is the answer in this case? Attached find clipping from the Billboard in explanation. I have a Standard machine, with motor drive. Use 30 amperes through Mercury Arc Rectifier. Meter registers 15 amperes on 220 volt A. C. Can you tell me why a motor run with current from a rectifier loses its magnetism in about one year? Having trouble with mine, I took it apart and by testing found the fields to be demagnetized to such an extent that with all the resistance cut out, the armature would only revolve slowly. The wiring and coil windings were all O. K. Got new castings, had them wound for 50 volts, put them in and everything has been all right since. If a motor in the condition of mine was run on D. C. for one month it would regain its field magnetism. Why is this and why does it loose it when using D. C. through a rectifier?"

I was unable to locate the article giving the whiting formula. However, the slide you sent in certainly is a dandy. The coating is all that could be desired. I assume that you mix up whiting with glue, coat the slide and then dip it in a pail of water, which removes the surplus glue, leaving a coated surface such as appears on the sample slide. Evidently, you have some method of tracing the figures in newspapers. How do you do it? The item from the Billboard referred to, reads as follows: "Panic in Chicago Picture Theater, Chicago, Ills., Mar. 5th, (special to the Billboard). A crowd of panic-stricken women and children fought to escape from the Peerless Theater near Division Street and Milwaukee Ave., to-night. The explosion of a moving picture machine filled the theater with smoke and set fire to the gallery."

The answer to this, in the opinion of the writer, is that the Billboard, while forced to take cognizance of moving pictures, is essentially a theatrical paper, and not a moving picture paper. It caters to the actor, and the actor is not at all averse to seeing a left handed swipe handed the moving picture whenever possible. It may be that the Billboard is so ignorant of moving picture affairs that it does not know that a moving picture machine does not, cannot, never did, and will not "explode," but we doubt this. As regards the motor, I think I shall refer this proposition to our readers, with the remark that a D. C. dynamo magnet has very slight residual magnetism, and while I am not sure, I presume the motor magnets are the same. The magnetism is built up by the current itself. Will some correspondent who is thoroughly familiar with such things kindly deal with this matter? I might add that from a sentence, not reproduced, I take it the motor was originally wound for 70 volts, whereas the current is about 48.

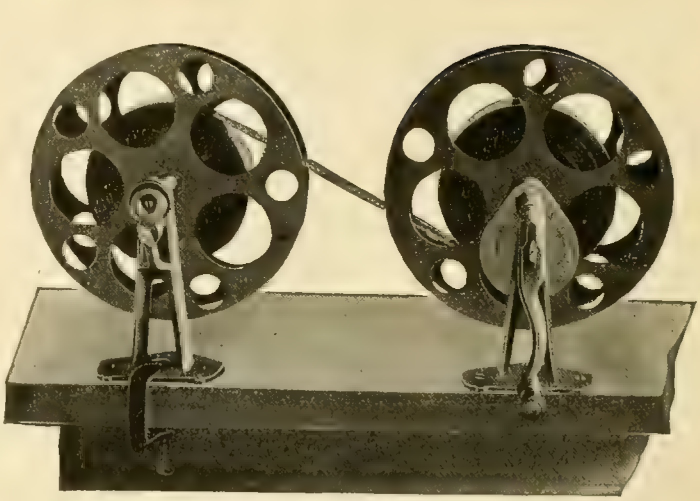
MORE BUNK.—Some friend in Jacksonville, Fla., sends in a clipping from a daily paper of March 14th, concerning a fire scare. It is so utterly ridiculous that it is worth printing as comedy. The clipping reads as follows:

"Tuesday night about nine o'clock a serious fire was narrowly averted when a film exploded in the operating cage at the Rex Theater, the largest moving picture house in the city. The explosion was caused by the film breaking on the top sprocket, jumping the gate and coming in contact with the arc. The film immediately took fire and in a few seconds had exploded, destroying the entire picture and the reel. The machine, which is a Power's No. 6, was unscathed. Manager Platt happened to be near the operator's cage at the time, and as soon as he saw the film break and strike the arc, he grabbed the awe-stricken operator by the neck and jerked him out of the room, slamming the door as he did so, thereby saving him from serious injury. Owing to the fact that the interior of the operator's cage is steel lined, the fire was confined to the cage. The other films were unharmed."

As an example of "jackass journalism," this I believe swipes the whole bakeshop, oven, pies, doughnuts and all. How under the heavens a self respecting editor, however prejudiced against the moving picture, can allow such examples of crass ignorance and stupidity to appear in his columns is beyond me. That matter of the film jumping a gate and striking the arc is at least unique. It displays ignorance of a little more classic type than even that ordinarially shown by reporters when dealing with moving picture affairs

NO THANHOUSER "CARMEN."

Learning that another Independent producer had made preparations to film "Carmen," Thanhouser Company state they will not put out this subject as previously announced.



THE SMITH REWINDER.

There are already so many makes of rewinders on the market that the question may be asked—Why another? Certainly there is no room for another unless it has features to recommend it that have not hitherto been utilized and this is why the Smith rewinder came to be made and why it has been selling rapidly wherever it has been shown. The first feature to recommend the Smith rewinder is its substantial construction and neat finish. The gears are encased and they are thicker than generally used, therefore being more durable. But the main talking point is that the reels do not have to be clamped or fastened on to the Smith rewinder; just slide them on the peg and no matter how swiftly the handle is turned the reel will not slip off. This is a great advantage, and the way it is managed is simple enough: the standards which support the reels are cast so that they lean slightly backward; the axle that supports the reel is therefore tilted upwards, causing the reel to cling to its support. Quantity prices on the Smith rewinder may be obtained from H. A. Mackie, Inc., 21 East 14th Street, New York, who have secured the agency.

"REDEMPTION," A 3-REEL ECLAIR FEATURE.

There has just arrived in America from Paris an ambitious three-reel subject by the French Eclair Company, entitled "Redemption." The picture is an account of a helpless girl who by a misfortune, not her own, was cast among a horde of wealthy wolves in the gay capital of France. It is an excellent illustration of the great conspiracy of age against youth which seems to obtain to a greater or less degree in all parts of the world. Her cup of joy was brief indeed as compared with the meed of anguish heaped upon her undeserving head by men who no doubt had daughters of their own whom they would rather see dead than be consigned to such a fate as they themselves had ordained for the girl in question.

Driven at last to sickness by the hard luck that afflicts all transgressors of the laws of nature, whether innocent or guilty, her meeting with the sisters of mercy is brought about, and by the same means her final redemption from the evils of her moral ignorance. The picture teaches a great lesson that will probably strike home in many cases, in many places.

This picture has been purchased as a State right feature by Mr. A, Warner, formerly of the Pittsburg Photoplay Company, and well known in the trade. The film will be one of a list of high-class features that will be handled by Mr. Warner, all of which will be known as "Warner's Features." Mr. Warner will not follow the usual plan of selling State rights for a lump sum or bonus proposition. In effect, State rights will be given practically free, Mr. Warner taking his profit from the running foot price at which the film will be sold. These State rights are now open to purchase for immediate delivery and it will be a case of first come first served. Mr. Warner has opened an office in the Exchange Building at 145 West 45th Street, New York City, which will be his headquarters from this time on. Elsewhere in this issue will be found a full synopsis of the "Redemption," as well as Mr. Warner's regular advertisement. "Redemption" will probably be reviewed at length in these columns later on.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"THE DOVE AND THE SERPENT" (Imp).

Tortola was a dove and Luis was a serpent. She, with her father, the old senor, led an ideal life until Luis entered the home. Her heart went out to him because he was handsome and persuasive. But it was not long before she discovered that the serpent, true to his imputed origin, was treacherous.

He fell in love, after tiring of his dove, with a picturesque girl, who belonged to anybody who would flatter her and gratify her whims for display and gaiety. So the poor little dove went back home, whither she was followed by the serpent, but it was too late. The fond and true lover, who had been in the background all through, claimed the wounded heart. A happy marriage, therefore, came to reward the trusting Tortola.

Scene from "The Dove and the Serpent" (Imp).

The story is laid amidst the still pictureqe life in modern Mexico, and illustrates the passionate life led by the Latins in their love affairs. Tortola is played by Margarita Fischer, and Harry Pollard is the lover who is finally successful in winning over the dove to peace and happiness. Edward Lyons is the serpent. Release date is April 4.

"A CHANGE OF STRIPES" (Imp).

The stripes that are changed are those of an escaping convict. The man has, by a series of miracles, suddenly got away from prison. He has not had time to turn his newly found liberty to account when an automobile appears. This thing has temporarily stopped and the owner has departed for more fuel. Enter Mr. Convict, who persuades the frightened woman left in the car to let him drive on to a place of safety. Then he turns her and the car adrift.

By accident, the owner of the car suddenly appears before the escaping convict. The latter is a man of nerve and daring. Pointing a pistol at the head of the auto owner, he forces him to effect a change of stripes. In other words, he changes clothes with him. So the convict becomes garbed in civilian attire, has money, keys, and some visiting cards in his pocket, whilst the innocent auto owner is made to look like a convict. Of course, the plot develops along fairly obvious lines.

A reward is offered for the escaped convict and the man in the stripes is at first mistaken for the fugitive until he explains matters satisfactorily.

Scene from "A Change of Stripes" (Imp).

Meanwhile, the convict, elated with his new-found liberty, makes for the auto owner's home and is about to depart with some of the plunder of that pretty residence, when the auto owner catches him up and delivers him up to justice.

The important role in this comedy falls upon Harry Pollard, as the escaping convict. It is a comedy set amidst Californian scenery, showing the adventures which may befall a young couple out for an innocent day's automobile recreation. April 6th is release date.

ESSANAY GRECIAN DRAMA.

Always seeking for a real feature with which to please photoplay-fans, the Essanay Company are releasing a magnificent dramatic production entitled "Napatia, The Greek Singer," in which a thrilling run of the fire department is vividly shown. The plot is strikingly original. A young fireman falls in love with Napatia, a Greek singer of the streets and, one day, tells her if she ever needs him, to turn in an alarm. A week later Napatia is beaten by her foster parents and imprisoned in a dirty room. Poor Napatia, feeling she needs her fireman lover badly, sets fire to some papers, holds them near the window and soon an alarm is turned in. Naturally her lover and his men soon burst in the door and, when the truth of the "fire" is learned, the young fellow gains permission of his chief to marry Napatia, while his men stand by itching for a chance to turn the hose on the venomous foster parents.

'ALKALI' IKE'S BOARDING HOUSE" (Essanay).

Doesn't this name sound familiar? What film-fan in the country isn't on the jump when he sees an "Alkali" Ike announcement strung across the front of his favorite theater? G. M. Anderson, director of the Essanay Western company, struck a sympathetic humor chord of the vast American public when he originated the famous "Alkali" Ike series that are delighting millions of people all over the world.

These popular films are steadily growing more and more humorous and mirth-provoking, and each successive new one is far superior to the others. This is especially true of "'Alkali' Ike's Boarding House," the latest and laughiest of Mr. Anderson's wonderful series.

"Alkali" and his companions on the Coyote Ranch string into dinner one noon-time and make a horrible discovery. The soup is awful!

A consultation of war is held and, after heated discussion, "Alkali" is selected with great care to inform the cook of the aforesaid terrible soup. Now "Alkali" isn't exactly stuck on the high honor, but, realizing he must appear brave before the others, tightens his belt and stalks to the kitchen where he finds Bridget, the Czaress of pots and pans, vigorously mashing potatoes with a ferocious scowl. "Alkali" finally manages to weakly voice the common complaint and the storm breaks.

Scene from "Alkali Ike's Boarding House" (Essanay).

He is landed back among his pals from one terrible blow of Bridget's fist and, before the boys can gain cover, an avalanche of potatoes, cups, saucers, kettles, boiling water, saucepans and various other kitchen utensils descends upon them and they seek refuge outside, wet and bedraggled.

It doesn't take Bridget long to pack up her things, smash what remaining dishes are left and flaunt off forever, leaving the boys gazing after her from their retreat in a convenient hay-loft.

Naturally the question now arises: "Who'll do the cookin'?" Not a single volunteer offers his services and finally straws are drawn and—"Alkali" is the new cook! Now "Alkali" doesn't happen to know the slightest thing about cooking, but he manfully dons an apron and takes possession of the kitchen. A new supply of crockery is procured and "Alkali" is left to puzzle out the menu for the first meal.

After due deliberation "Alkali" decides upon several kettlefuls of steaming things and gets them to boiling nicely on the stove. He now prepares to bake biscuits and is mounting a chair to reach the flour when Porky Flynn enters and demands to know when dinner will be ready. Now "Alkali" is not in the best of temper, having scorched his fingers, and suffered in an atmosphere of about 200 degrees all morning, consequently Porky receives the contents of the flour-bin over his head and leaves in great disgust. Stumpy Adams next bobs in with inquiry as to dinner-time written on his face, but is highly humiliated when the contents of one of the kettles strikes him squarely between the eyes and lands him outside the door in a most ridiculous posture.

One by one the boys troop in to hurry "Alkali" with dinner, and each one is driven out amidst a storm of the nearest things "Alkali" can lay his hands on. For dinner he loads them up with nothing but bread and that night they go to their bunks well-nigh starved.

Next morning "Alkali" routs them up with a noisy bell and a douse of cold water in their faces, herds them to breakfast, then turns the tables on them nicely. Suddenly covering them with his six-shooter, "Alkali" calmly tells them they are to do the dish-washing, scrubbing and other general work. The boys reach for their guns, but discover "Alkali" has trickily relieved them of all artillery and they are helpless.

Scene from Alkali Ike's Boarding House" (Essanay).

So it is that "Alkali" sits calmly on the kitchen table with leveled gun, while the boys rub, scrub and wash vigorously, an incentive to work being a shot from "Alkali" at frequent intervals while he pounds into them the old adage that "the worm will turn."

Augustus Carney is uproariously funny as usual in the role of Alkali," a character that has made him famous throughout the country. All the other parts are excellently interpreted, and the picture is one of the surest laugh-getters of the month. It is booked for release April 23rd.

ONLY ONE MANUFACTURER AT INDIANAPOLIS MEET.

At the recent meeting, March 19 and 20, of the Indiana Moving Picture Exhibitors' League, the comment was widely made that the only manufacturer, licensed or independent, who could find time to send a man to that important meeting was the American Film Manufacturing Company, which was represented in the person of R. R. Nehls, manager.

About seventy-five exhibitors and exchangemen from Indiana were present and the members of the league felt that their gathering was important enough to warrant some attendance from the manufacturers.

R. R. Nehls secured the Lyric Theater on Wednesday for a private exhibition of American productions. He had an enthusiastic audience that crowded the Lyric to the doors. The exhibitors were loud in their praises of the American's policy, as described by Mr. Nehls, of adding to the popularity of "Flying A" pictures and increasing attendance at the theaters by the use of large space in seventy-two daily newspapers throughout America in the interest of its weekly productions.

Licensed "First Runs"

Where They May Be Seen to the Best Advantage in Manhattan—Conditions in the Various Houses.

WHERE to see "first run" Licensed pictures in New York is a question frequently asked by picture fans not familiar with conditions in the Greater City. The Moving Picture World's reviewer, whose business it is to see all the pictures released each week, gives a comprehensive answer to the question and, in passing, mentions some of the conditions existing at the various houses visited by him and the features most pleasing to him. To begin with, he says that he enjoys most of all his visit to Proctor's 125th Street Theater, giving as his reason that he felt more at home among the patrons of that house and that it was more comfortable, especially in the winter. This is, of course, a matter of personal opinion and preference.

By arrangement with the General Film Company, the B. F. Keith and the F. F. Proctor houses show all the new Licensed pictures on the day they are released—six on each week day. Of these, two are shown at Proctor's 23rd Street Theater; two at the Bijou Dream, Keith's old Union Square Theater; one at Proctor's 125th Street Theater, and one at Keith's Harlem Opera House.

The operating rooms in all four of these houses are high up in the second balcony and the picture is thrown on the screen at a sharp angle. This disadvantage is fully compensated for by clever manipulation of the projecting machines.

All the Keith and also the Proctor houses have this winter been thoroughly renovated and repainted. They are very bright and cheerful. The new lobby at Proctor's 125th Street Theater is perhaps the prettiest entrance of any theater of its kind in the Greater City. The house is very well ventilated. Smoking is permitted in the first balcony, yet it never makes the house stuffy nor can it be noticed even on cold days and when the house, as often happens, is playing to full capacity. It is also clearly lighted, but the pictures do not suffer at all from this. They are clear and bright from the competently handled machine, which is operated on six-hour shifts by Mr. Murray Stein and Mr. Frank Boswell. Our reviewer says he does not now recall noticing, during the last six months, a single break in a picture while being projected. They must be very competent young men. Their framing up and focusing are very good. Mr. Jacob Holstein, the manager of the house, takes a keen interest in the pictures, and although the house is a general vaudeville theater, the pictures are given the place of honor. The music is provided by a single piano; but it is very well played. Four pictures are projected every day. One is a first-run, two are very recent and one is some good picture of several months back.

The Harlem Opera House, comparatively speaking, is a new theater. It is very commodious and very well ventilated. Smoking is permitted in the first balcony. It is a vaudeville theater and the home of the Harlem Stock Company in which the leading lady is Mrs. Beatrice Morgan, and which has won deserved fame for its short but very bright dramatic sketches and comedies.

The projection of Mr. Anthony Boscarelli is fine and, though the house is well lighted, the pictures are very sharp and bright. From the opening hour at eleven a. m. until one p.m. only pictures and a song with slides are given.

The program is as follows: A good old picture is shown first, followed by a release two days old and then the song by Mr. Sol Levoy, the stage manager of the house. It is a pleasure to compliment the house on this song. Mr. Levoy has a fine voice and is very popular with the audience. Following the song is the first-run picture and then another film, two days old; after that the program is mixed with vaudeville which is often very good. Our reviewer also compliments the house on its obliging and genial doorman, Mr. Harry Heyman.

The Bijou Dream, on Union Square, is the old and famous Keith's Theater. Its show begins at nine o'clock in the morning and until eleven consists exclusively of pictures. Two of these are first-runs, two are two days old and one is some good picture, usually a recall. The operating room is in charge of Jack C. Mason and John F. Recker. Their projection is very good; but conditions are against them on dark days when, at times, they don't seem to get enough light. The theater is in the heart of the business district with many large factories and business offices around them. Consequently the drop in voltage on dark mornings is very marked.

This house is smaller, more cramped, than the two uptown theaters. It has been renovated from top to bottom during the last winter and presents an immaculate appearance. It has also just installed brand new, roomy chairs which are most comfortable. From eleven a.m. for twelve hours the program gives a picture after every two or three acts of vaudeville. The Harlem Opera House Stock Company also gives sketches in this theater.

At Proctor's 23rd Street Theater four pictures are shown. The show begins at eleven in the morning and is continuous until eleven at night, with a picture, then two or three acts, then another picture. The pictures are bright and well focused, although the house is lighted. They are accompanied by a pianist who follows them very pleasingly. Two of the pictures are new releases and two are two days old. This is the usual program; but it is not always adhered to. Mr. How, the manager, is an enthusiastic lover of good pictures, especially of the laugh makers. He balances his programs carefully. If, as sometimes happens, the exchange sends him four typical "Westerns," one or two of them go back at once. He prefers to show good commercials rather than poor new releases. He doesn't often have to reject his pictures, however. His house is very cheery in appearance. During the winter it has been redecorated and changed throughout and is scrupulously clean and comfortable.

There is a house at 31st Street and Broadway—Gane's—where two new releases and two pictures of the day before are shown. Two or three days every week, when possible, three new releases and one of the day before are shown. Mr. Gane shows three or four acts of vaudeville also. He caters to a high class of patrons and his vaudeville is of the same quality as at the Keith and the Proctor houses. His house is clean, cosy and comfortable. It is not lighted so brigthly as are the Proctor houses; but the projection is very good indeed. A pianist accompanies the films. The house has an entrance that looks a bit forbidding, being almost covered with paper announcements; but once inside, the most fastidious could hardly fail to be pleased.

Of the Loew houses we can only mention in this article the Herald Square Theater, at 35th Street and Broadway. There, four pictures and two or three illustrated songs comprise the whole program. The show begins at nine a.m.. An orchestra and a piano accompany the pictures. The projection is the best we have seen. Two—sometimes three—of the pictures are new releases, two are of the day before. It is a very comfortable and pleasant place in which to see the pictures.

NESTOR NOTES.

Mr. David Horsley, president of the Nestor Film Company, is again returning East from the Nestor studios at Hollywood, Cal., accompanied by Mrs. Horsley, Stanley, the young hopeful, and Captain Davy—he should be "in our busy midst" by the time this issue is spread abroad. It is possible his stay this time may be of sufficient duration to enable him to meet and renew acquaintance with many old friends whom he has not seen since the advent of the Hollywood studios.

Charlie Simone was the big representative of the Nestor Film Company at the recent convention of the Ohio Exhibitors' League at Dayton, Ohio, where, as is always the case with Charlie, he made his presence felt. A flying trip to Chicago on important Nestor business and return home completed another busy week in the busy life of the Busy Bee of Bayonne and Boostville.

It is in order to offer congratulations to Nestor on their picture entitled "Her Indian Hero," which is to be released April 17th. An advance copy has been shown and those who were fortunate enough to witness the first projection are unanimous in acclaiming it a strong and beautiful production and one which will add another star to the constellation of Nestor releases, which have placed the pioneer Independent moving picture maker in the front rank of the entire industry.

THE TRIMMER TRIMMED.

The biter bitten, is the way the old phrase has it, but since in bunco parlance the bunco man is known as a "steerer" or "trimmer," it's a case of the trimmer trimmed—for this is about a bunco story.

Thanhouser issues it Friday, April 12, under the name, "An Easy Mark." The trimmer is the smartly-dressed young man to the right. The elderly man is the attorney for the woman in the chair. The trimmer sees the lawyer pay a large sum of money over to the woman, and proceeds to "trim" her of it. But she, for all her unwisdom, evades his slick efforts and the film shows just how.

BURIAL OF THE MAINE IN KINEMACOLOR.

The Kinemacolor Company announces that it has secured excellent pictures of the ceremonies attending the final disposition of the old battleship Maine, which was destroyed in Havana harbor in 1898.

"DRIFTWOOD" (American).

The opening scene shows a squalid home, such as may be seen in the South. The exterior is a barnlike structure and pretty Mrs. William Jessup is seen buried to her elbows in a washtub. Leaning against the house, dirty, unkempt, lazy William Jessup basked in the summer sunshine. His wife roused him and sent him off to look for work. Going into the little cow town of La Mesa, Jessup met Jack Wilberting. Wilberting had designs on little Mrs. Jessup and promptly offered to buy Jessup a drink. This he did and supplemented the drink with a bottle of whiskey, leaving Jessup in no condition to do other than continue his basking in the sunshine. Wilberting then sought out Mrs. Jessup and endeavored to make love to her, but was repulsed.

Scene from "Driftwood" (American).

In the meantime an automobile party coming down the road suddenly found themselves out of water. They called on Mrs. Jessup for that most necessary ingredient. Little Miss Van Chesler took pity on the woful plight of the pretty Mrs. Jessup and when she returned to the car asked her parents to aid her.

Scene from "Driftwood" (American).

Meanwhile, Wilberting, having been repulsed, again sought out Jessup, whom he found in a pitiful state of inebriety. Placing a gun in Jessup's hand, Wilberting bade him commit suicide, hoping that the drink-crazed brain of Jessup would receive the suggestion and thus clear the way so that he could continue his attentions to Mrs. Jessup. Going off into the rocks by the roadside, Jessup arrived in time to see the auto party, having obtained water, again on their way. Instead of committing suicide, Jessup was suddenly seized with the desire to hold up the automobile and rob its occupants. Little Miss Van Chesler promptly alighted, bringing with her a large bundle of groceries which the party had purchased at a neighboring store. But Jessup, uncertain of his ground, compelled the party to carry the bag of provisions to his home. There he was met by Mrs. Jessup, who promptly recognized her friends. The strain was too much for Jessup. His shattered nerves suddenly gave way and he decided on the spot to brace up and do better in the future.

A week later we see him applying, by accident, at the home of the Van Chesler's for work. The father attempted to drive him from the premises, but little Miss Van Chesler again interceded in his behalf and influenced the irate parent to give him a position about the household.

A month later Miss Van Chesler again visited Mrs. Jessup, whom she found more destitute and poverty stricken than ever. The girl induced Mrs. Jessup to climb into the automobile, taking her home, where she arrayed her in presentable garments. Then Miss Van Chesler took her around to the rear of the mansion, where her unbelieving eyes saw the man whose name she bore rejuvenated and worthy of her.

"OH, YOU RAGTIME!" (Eclair)

Eclair will be releasing on April 18th a rollicking old-fashioned comedy picture entitled "Oh, You Ragtime!" The theme of the picture is not altogether new. It dates back to the story of the Pied Piper of Hameln, which is a very illustrious precedent. The theme of this creation is that of a ragtime professor who played such "heel-ticklin'" music on his piano that he blocked the wheels of commerce and domestic duty. His music was so very catchy that anyone who came within the range of it was obliged to immediately drop everything in hand and dance to the merry tune. The professor was only practicing and was unaware that he had paralyzed the business of the neighborhood. When he found it out he suggested playing a gallop to hurry the people back to work. He played a quick-step, and the way they flew back to their work is very funny. This is done, of course, by trick effects and it is quite certain to be a scream wherever exhibited.

Scene from "Oh, You Ragtime!" (Eclair).

NEWFOUNDLAND EXHIBITOR CALLS.

Mr. J. J. Duff, of the Pro Queen Theater, St. Johns, Newfoundland, dropped in at our New York office one day this week to pay his respects. He tells us that St. Johns is a more up-to-date city than most people imagine, and that the climate there is, if anything, more temperate than in New York. As a moving picture town St. Johns is a winner. Mr. Duff states that the fans have declared themselves in favor of cowboys and Indians by an overwhelming majority. The mere announcement of a Western picture is sure to fill a house. St. Johns supports four photoplay houses, two running straight pictures and two using vaudeville with pictures. The Pro Queen Theater seats 750.

CHINESE REVOLUTION PICTURE RIGHTS.

The Oriental Film Company, of 1237-1239 Van Ness Ave., San Francisco, Cal., which has been making high-class pictures, topical, educational and dramatic, in the Far East, reports a very gratifying sale of the state rights in their big feature, "The Revolution in China." So far nineteen states have been sold and old Mexico also. This glorious picture is in two reels (2,000 feet) and is a sure money maker.

Cutting Off the Feet

By H. F. Hoffman.

Some time ago in the columns of the World there was voiced a polite protest against the tendency of many motion picture makers to cut the feet of the actors out of the scene. There were fond hopes hereabouts that the morsel of suggestion thus cast upon the waters would some day come back twice blest, having blessed the sender as well as the giver. But the fond hope was not fulfilled; for, instead of following that bit of wise counsel, the film makers straightway began cutting off the figures at the knees. Nor did it end there. Things kept getting worse, until now it is a common sight to witness a photoplay the greater part of which is acted so close to the camera that the actors are seen only from the waist upwards.

Facial expression—that seems to be the dominating influence that brings about this inartistic result. The American producers, after they learned the rudiments of their craft, uncovered an entirely new school of pantomime. In the heyday of the business, when exhibitors were making fortunes out of small investments, the European picture had the call. Pantomime to the old world was an exact science. Every known gesture and expression had for years been labeled and catalogued as definitely as the rows of bottles in a chemist's shop. With the play-going public of America, the European school of pantomime at one time found favor over our crude home-made productions. Exhibitors clamored at the exchanges for foreign films. This was disheartening because it really did seem that the American product would never catch up. But at last the American producer found himself. He evolved a school of pantomime that swept away the antiquated formulas and proved to be such a revelation as to eclipse the European school even with the Europeans themselves.

The difference between the two schools is broad and plain. The European school is based more upon bodily movements than upon the mobility of the face. The American school relies more upon the expression of the face and the suppression of bodily movement. It remained for the American to demonstrate that more dramatic emotion is to be expressed by keeping the body rigid that by violent gesticulation. Facial expression is the keynote of American pantomime. It has made American pictures popular all over the world. But now the question arises: Is facial expression being carried too far?

It appears that many of the factors that make for art are being ignored for the sake of getting facial expression. Artistic backgrounds are being sacrificed in the mad desire to catch the roll of the eye. Correct composition is being neglected for the same reason. Actors are sent to the tropics and to lands that are rugged in nature for the sake of their excellent backgrounds. When the pictures they make are thrown upon the screen, the actors so completely block out the scenery that they could as well have saved their car fare and done the work at home. If this tendency keeps up we shall soon be seeing nothing of the actor but his head and shoulders and those of "the girl," in which case a brick wall will be the only background necessary. It seems "everybody's doing it," except one—the Rex Company. Study their work for consistent and praiseworthy effort to keep the full figure on the screen. No lack of facial expression there.

When the average American producer is taxed with these shortcomings he will tell you that he is obliged to do as he does in order to get facial expression. According to his theory and practice an actor must be as close to the camera as possible so that the slightest movement of his countenance may be recorded. The only way to do this, he tells you, is to cut off the feet. What good are feet? No good at all—granted for the sake of argument, but not admitted. Now an example: A picture is made with all pedals amputated. The first print is projected for the inspection of the producer and the owner of the business. It is thrown upon the factory screen—a little 3 x 4 surface that renders the half-length figures no larger than the height of the frame, or about life size. The owner will then complain that the facial expression is obscure, especially that of the actors further back. Later the same picture is shown in a theater and the foreground figures loom up like giants of old. The facial expression is then quite evident. The picture is all facial expression, and nothing else. Not in the film lies the fault, but in the small size of the factory screen. It may be contended that the question of size is only a relative matter, as the picture remains the same regardless of size. That is granted also for the sake of argument (with mental reservations).

Art is the element that suffers most by cutting off the feet. Moving picture making is going to be one of the fine arts, and the sooner that is understood by all hands the better. This brings us to the question of composition. Pictorial art is composition. A picture is a combination of several factors into a complete and harmonious whole. An arrangement with the feet cut off is not a complete and harmonious whole. There is something lacking. Most people cannot tell exactly what is wrong, but they feel it nevertheless. Neither can they analyze and tell why a composition is correct, but they realize it unconsciously because it satisfies. The French and Italian companies send us few pictures with the legs cut off, because most Latins have the artistic instinct and would consider such a composition as being defective.

Observations here and there, point to a little rule; that for every portion that is cut from an actor's lower extremities an equal measure of uninteresting ceiling or frieze must be added at the top. It will be left to the reader or the director as to whether a fine carpet pattern is or is not more pleasing to look at than an equal amount of ginger-bread wall. Notice this sometime when you are at the movies.

A good training for directors is to visit art galleries. There one will see very few compositions with the feet cut off. The only paintings with the feet cut off are character studies and portraits, and those have no place as such in moving pictures.

A better training is to learn to paint. And after the director has learned to paint, let him illustrate a magazine story. Let him make pictures of the characters with their feet cut off. Then let him try to sell the stuff for a living and see how near he will come to starving to death.

HUGH ANTOINE D'ARCY.

Here is another live one to add to the list of moving picture press agents. Hugh A. D'Arcy is at present in charge of the publicity of the Lubin Manufacturing Company, of Philadelphia, for which he is also scenario writer and editor. The history of his life up to date is almost that of the theatrical business of America since 1872, at which date he came to New York, and since when he has been almost continuously engaged in some capacity in connection with the theater or the theatrical attraction. He was born in a suburb of Paris in 1853 and accompanied his parents to England shortly after. At the age of sixteen years he commenced his theatrical career in the capacity of call boy and basket carrier in the Theatre Royal, Bristol, England. In the United States he has served as press agent and manager for most of the leading companies since 1878.

Mr. D'Arcy achieved distinction as a playwright and writer of poems, songs and lyrics, too numerous to mention here.

MELIES' COWBOY A CONTEST WINNER.

Otto Meyer Wins Ten Prizes in Southwestern Interstate Rodeo.

The Westerners look upon a bucking bronco riding contest as Easterners do a Marathon race. Business is suspended long enough to give everyone a chance to take it in and they come from miles around to see the boys "go through the stunts."

The Melies Stock Company at Santa Paula, California, is composed almost entirely of true Westerners, and when the Rodeo, the great Southwestern interstate cowboys' contest was held in Los Angeles, March 9 to 23, the boys of that company heard the call, and Mr. Gaston Melies who is proud of his skillful cowboys and himself fast becoming a thorough Westerner, decided to attend and back them up.

And some cowboys are these. Otto Meyer, foreman cowboy of the Melies Stock Company, entered for every event and while his boss was looking on won two first prizes, two second, one third and one fourth prize in the wild horse races.

A maverick is an unbranded steer and belongs to whoever can capture him. When first caught it is one of the wildest animals known. In the maverick races few were able to even stick on the maverick's back, but Otto seems to know the language of wild animals and came off with two first prizes. In the team roping contest for championship of the Southwest, the Melies cowboy won third prize, and in leading wild horses, first prize.

But of all events the one that proved "who was who" in the Southwest was the riding of the famous wild pitching horse, "Gaviotta." Braves from many states succeeded in mounting this untamed steed, only to be thrown or to have to resort to clinging to the horse's neck and make for safety. At last came Otto, who mouned erect, rode erect and stuck as if he had been planted on the animal's back. Again and again "Gaviotta" pitched, but in vain, and Otto was hailed as the only one in all the Southwest who had conquered this beast.

Otto Meyer has appeared in many Melies pictures, but after the contest Mr. Melies got hold of his scenario editor, and we may soon expect some stories in which Otto and his skilful, dare-devil riding will play a prominent part.

"THE LETTER WITH THE BLACK SEALS" (Eclair).

The American Eclair Company has released an interesting Western picture under the title of "The Letter with the Black Seals" that will be found entertaining. It presents a number of exciting situations in which love and an inheritance cut a considerable figure. The story centers around Kitty, the lovely heir of Uncle Bill, who has left his ranch to her. Kitty lived in New York and is in love with Kid, one of the cowboys. A disinherited nephew, Ralph, endeavors to secure the fortune of Uncle Bill, first by marrying Kitty, but then she turns him down. A series of exciting events follow in which Kitty and the Kid win out.

A STORY OF THE LONG AGO.

The scene printed herewith is of a big moment in a Thanhouser old-time romance, released Tuesday, April 9, "A Love of Long Ago." The priest in the picture had loved the girl who kneels. But he lost to her rival, whose life he had in fact saved—to save the girl unhappiness. Then he vanished from the world, entered a monastery. On a stroll near the monastery, he encounters the girl and the rival, now the husband. They do not recognize him in his frock, and he, pausing to give his blessing, affects not to know them—and passes within the monastery walls to —forget.

HELLO CENTRAL (April 1).—Jack Carbitt, a young business man, enters his office and calls a number. Midred Clark, the telephone girl at the exchange, is reading a novel and does not answer. Jack gets angry, but Mildred at last hears and connects him. It is the wrong number. Jack gets in touch with central again, but Mildred proves a match for him and talks back. Jack gives it up and angrily exits to see his man personally. That evening they meet at a small social gathering at the house of a friend. Jack acquiesces to his host's request that he escort Mildred home and the first thing next morning sends a bouquet of flowers to her. Mildred is delighted and takes them to the exchange with her. Later in the day Jack tries to get a number. Central, in the person of Mildred, is so busy admiring his flowers, that she does not hear the call of duty. Jack departs for the manager's office to report that girl. Jack storms in on the manager and the latter sends for Mildred. Jack is astounded when he discovers it is Mildred. Mildred is excused, but passes by the apologizing Jack with haughty disdain. In the evening Jack goes to her home and outside the door waits her arrival. She brushes by him, but leaves the door ajar. He enters and after an appropriate punishment, makes his peace and is in the market for a ring.

SHALL NEVER HUNGER (April 4).—Tom Mullaney, hungry and forlorn, is one evening walking the main street of a small town. Tom accosts a man and asks for help. He is pushed aside. The poor derelict enters church and congregation look at him. The minister after a hymn commences his discourse. Many penitents approach the Evangelist and receive encouragement. Mullaney totters to the platform and falls exhausted. The minister and another man phone for an ambulance. The doctor examines the poor fellow and pronounces it a case of starvation. The minister returns to the platform and putting a bill in the plate, urges a collection for the derelict, which is freely responded to. Mullaney is taken to the hospital and the minister after seeing him safely cared for, procures provisions and clothes and visits Mullaney's wife and two children. He quickly gives relief to the starving family and takes them well wrapped up to the hospital. There he meets Steve Brandt, the man who assisted Mullaney out of the church. The nurses permit the family to approach the sick father and Brandt assures him that as soon as he is able to work he will give him a good job.

THE SACRIFICE (April 3).—Howard Belknap, a youth of twenty, only son of an attractive widow, while at a ball falls in love with Enid La Rose, a dancer. Howard's mother is greatly disturbed and appeals to an old friend and admirer, Henry Carlton, to save the boy. In her pertubation Mrs. Belknap agrees to marry Carlton if he is successful. Carlton tries to reason with Howard, but finding it of no use determines to win the girl himself. Howard is very angry and next day writes to Enid asking her to lunch with him. His mother discovers this and asks Carlton to prevent the meeting. Carlton asks the girl to luncheon himself and while at the restaurant Howard discovers them and creates an unpleasant scene. Carlton and Enid leave and on the way back to her apartments she is hurt in a collision between their automobile and another. Carlton takes her to her rooms and discovers that the girl has fallen in love with him. When the doctor arrives he tells Carlton that Enid will recover but though she may walk, she will never dance again. Carlton goes to Mrs. Belknap and tells her of the accident and of the helpless position in which he has placed the dancing girl. Mrs. Belknap offers to pay her a sum of money, but Carlton informs her that the accident is not all; the girl has grown to love him. Mrs. Belknap, who has already given her heart to Carlton, tells him of her own love. Carlton is greatly pained, but remains firm in his conviction that his duty lies with the young girl. He parts from Mrs. Belknap in great grief and goes back to Enid La Rose. He finds her suffering much pain, but with a smile for him; she tells him that she will never dance again. Carlton asks her to become his wife. The girl accepts.

FOOLING FATHER (April 6).—Si Baker, the young farmer, is in love with Betty Collins. Old Collins, a farmer, of Beck Corners, has other plans for his daughter. A city friend of Collins has written him that he is sending his son Harold for a visit on his farm This pleases Collins, who has hopes of getting Harold for a son-in-law. Mrs. Collins disapproves of trying to make the daughter marry a man she does not love. The mother favors Si Baker. Harold arrives at the farm, and in order to get him out of the way one evening (Si and Betty, to have a few moments to themselves), Si invites Harold to go with him on a coon hunt. Si puts a cat up in the top of a tree, then gets Harold to watch it (telling him it is a coon), while he runs to get some cartridges for the gun. While Harold is watching the tree, Si and Betty are spooning. Si bids Betty good-night, and goes home. Harold in the meantime has fallen asleep, and does not wake up until morning, when the cat jumps from the tree. Harold finds that he has been the butt-end of a joke. He finds a chance to get even, when he overhears Si and Betty planning an elopement and he at once informs the old man of their plans. While Harold is telling the old man of the elopement, he is overheard by young Collins, who immediately informs Si and Betty that the old man is on to their scheme. The affair is now laid before mother, who plans to out-wit dad. Two dummies are made and dressed to represent Si and Betty. They are placed in a buggy and started down the road. Pa and Harold have been watching and seeing the rig going down the road, lose no time in mounting horses to start after the elopers. While Pa and Harold are chasing the dummies, Ma takes Si and Betty to the minister to be married. Father does not know he has been chasing dummies until the horse walks into the water. Father and Harold rush in the water, pull the dummies from their seats and after a good wetting they find their mistake. On arriving at the house father is surprised to find mother, Betty and his new son-in-law waiting for them. There is nothing left for father to do but to take the joke good naturedly, which he does after a while, and everybody is happy.

ESSANAY.

BRONCHO BILLY AND THE GIRL (April 9).—Broncho Billy, a lawless Western renegade, reels out of the Rawhide saloon one day and comes face to face with the town preacher. The good man tries to show Broncho the error of his ways, but Broncho laughs and goes on to the Rawhide dance hall where a crowd of young people are enjoying themselves. Broncho is on the point of shooting up the place when Nan Fowler, a pretty ranch girl, takes the gun from his hand, leads him outside and secures his promise to never drink again. A week later Broncho meets Nan, accompanies her home, is introduced to her mother and made welcome. A few days following, old Fowler is given one of Nan's photos and places it safely in his wallet. He now rides to town and receives a sum of money for the sale of some cattle. Broncho sees him leave with the money and, not knowing him, follows and holds him up. In his shack, Broncho examines the contents of the wallet and discovers Nan's photo. Realizing he has robber her father, he resolutely goes to the Fowler ranch-house and returns the loot to the old ranchman. Fowler is about to have him arrested, when Nan enters and pleads for Broncho, winning her father's consent to let him go. A moment later the sheriff enters, but Fowler gets rid of him without revealing Broncho's guilt, then offers him a place on the ranch. Filled with gratitude, Broncho warmly wrings his hand and earnestly promises to make good while Nan gives thanks for his reformation.

ALL IN THE FAMILY (April 11).—Joe Slocum, a young country boy, becomes tired of the humdrum farm life and longs to make his way in the city. Old Slocum finally consents to Joe's going and the young fellow leaves. Meanwhile, Beth Winters, a country girl with ambitions to become a great sculptress, pleads with her mother to allow her to go to the city and educate herself in her chosen art. The Widow Winters finally yields and Beth leaves. The young people meet accidently in the city and, by chance secure rooms in the same boarding house. Joe now falls into bad company and loses what little money he has. He cannot pay his room rent and the landlady summons the janitor to eject him. Joe becomes frightened and seeks safety in flight up the fire escape and, quite by accident, bolts into Beth's room. They recognize each other from the first meeting and Beth learns his trouble. Out of sympathy she gives him money for his rent. Joe pays the landlady, then determines to make himself worthy of Beth. Back in the country old Slocum is injured and the Widow Winters is called in to nurse him. The old people fall in love and determine upon a city wedding. Meanwhile, Joe makes good in business and marriage with Beth is the next step. The old people arrive at the minister's rectory, are asked to act as witness for another marriage he is about to perform and astonishment reigns when they discover their own children are the other couple. The minister declares a double wedding is in order, that it is "all in the family" and happiness reigns supreme.

LONESOME ROBERT (Apil 12).—Little Robert Woods, a cripple, gazes longingly from the window each day at the children romping past. In this way he becomes acquainted with Tom Morris, a stalwart, handsome chap who is a wireless operator in the plant of Mr. Harding, a capitalist nearby. Tom interests himself in the helpless little fellow and, to please him, installs a miniature wireless outfit in Robert's bedroom and teaches him the code. Each night Tom and Robert exchange messages back and forth between the office and the bedroom, and Robert becomes very proficient. One night Harding is forced to lock a large sum of money in the office safe and Tom is left to guard it. Two thugs now force an entrance into the office, overpower Tom and leave him bound on the table that contains his wireless outfit. While the crooks are in the inner office securing the money, Tom manages to wiggle his bound hands to the sender of the outfit and laboriously ticks out a cry for help to little Robert's bedroom. Robert is awakened by the noisy sputter, and spells out the message from Tom: "Help! Help! Robbers!" Robert's cries bring his father, who is a policeman. Instantly Woods dons his uniform and rushes out to head off the ruffians before they can escape from Harding's office. Meanwhile, the robbers have gotten the money, wave it before Tom's eyes and are on the point of escaping when the door is burst open and Woods, with two brother officers, confront them with guns. Mr. Harding is summoned on the 'phone and, an hour later, little Robert is made the happiest boy in the city by a handsome reward from Harding.

UNDER MEXICAN SKIES (April 13).—Pasquale, a half-breed Mexican, secures work on the ranch of old Fowler. Fowler has a pretty daughter, Vedah, who teaches the district school. Pasquale meets the girl on several occasions and falls in love with her. She repulses his attentions and tries to show him his error in loving her, but Pasquale is determined and, one day, rides to the schoolhouse after the children are dismissed. Finding Vedah alone he again renews his attentions and is on the point of taking her in his arms when she holds aloft a crucifix and, terror-stricken, Pasquale hurriedly leaves. Vedah returns to the ranch-house and her father, noticing her agitation, finally learns of Pasquale's intended insult. Furious, old Fowler arouses the cowboys; they capture Pasquale at his shack and are about to string him up when Vedah dashes up, pleads for the Mexican's life and secures his freedom. A few weeks later Vedah attracts the attention of a young Easterner who asks her to be his wife. She refuses and, for revenge, he lures her to the shack of Pasquale's companion, who aids him. Here the Easterner is about to force her into marriage when Pasquale returns, forces his pal who guards the shack to confess what is going on, then bursts in, drives the Easterner from the place with a threat of death, and returns Vedah to her father out of gratitude for her saving his life.

VITAGRAPH.

BURNT CORK (April 8).—An amateur minstrel show is given and everybody in town attends. Some of the best known citizens take part, among them Mr. Kirkus, who provides himself with a nice box of burnt cork. His son, a mischievous little rascal, comes across it and mixes the cork with ink. The night of the show everything is carried out according to programme. Kirkus makes a hit. When it comes to washing up, old man Kirkus can't get the black off his face. He makes his way homeward disgusted. His wife doesn't know him and he is refused admittance into his own home. He lies down at his door step, waiting for morning. While lying there, a colored man, escaping from his enraged wife, sees Kirkus and steals his hat and coat, replacing them with his own. The colored woman comes along, sees, as she thinks, her husband, and belabors Kirkus with her broom. Mrs. Kirkus hears the rumpus, rushes to the door, and recognizes her 'hubby,'' and rescues him.

PUSHMOBILE RACES (April 8).—A very popular sport with the boys of Los Angeles, California. The pushmobiles are a boy vehicle, occupied by a happy youngster and pushed along by another. In this film they present a pretty picture, being gaily festooned and decorated with flowers, ribbons and other ornaments that make them very attractive.

AT SCROGGINSES' CORNER (April 9).—The general store at Scrogginses' Corner is the favorite lounging and meeting place for the citizens of the locality. On an eventful day a rich couple call at the store and ask Si Bunny, the storekeeper, permission to leave a bundle there, to be called for on their return. The storekeeper discovers that the bundle contains an infant. He takes it to his home and brings it up as his own.

When the child has grown up to be an attractive young girl, Lee Livingston, a traveling salesman, makes love to her and induces her to leave home with him, on pretense of a visit to his folks. Old Si is broken-hearted and would have killed Livingston if he had not been prevented. She discovers on her arrival in the city that Livingston is a rascal. She repulses him, but ashamed to go home, makes her living as an artist's model. The young artist for whom she poses falls in love with her and proposes marriage. She will not consent until she has returned to Si Bunny, the only parent she has ever known. The young sculptor escorts her to Scrogginses' Corner.

Bunny receives her with joy and gladness, for he has always hoped and longed for her return. They get his blessing and consent to their marriage. The girl's mother, who deserted her, enters and asks her daughter to go with her. Helen rejects her overtures and remains with her "daddy" until her marriage to the young artist.

HIS FATHER'S SIN (April 10).—Brought up in luxury, Dick Livingston has every chance of sowing his wild oats. His behavior angers his father and he accuses Dick of stealing and disposing of one of his bonds. He refuses to have anything more to do with Dick. Giving him a check for $5,000, he tells him to depend upon himself in the future. Dick tells his sweetheart that when he has squared himself with his father he will return and marry her.

He goes into business and some time after his father meets with financial reverses, which he attributes to his son. When ruin stares Mr. Livingston in the face, Dick comes back, successful and triumphant. His father is still angry with him and bids him leave. Dick persuades his father to listen and then gives him a check sufficient to cover his losses and needs. Father and son become reconciled and Dick marries his sweetheart.

THE JOCULAR WINDS OF FATE (April 12).—Titled, but in debt, Lord Drumleigh is advised by his lawyer to marry an heiress. He recommends the daughter of Heinrich Humph, a brewer with plenty of money, but no ancestry. The brewer, out motoring with his family, discovers that his chauffeur is intoxicated and dismisses him on the spot. Humph is unable to run the machine himself. Lord Drumleigh, in his machine with his lawyer, sees Humph. The legal gent goes to his assistance, suggesting that his chauffeur will take them home. He goes back to Drumleigh and tells him to "get next" to the brewer. When the brewer reaches home, he employs Lord Drumleigh as his chauffeur, not knowing who he is. When the lord gets sight of Juliet Humph, the daughter, he is surprised and disappointed, for she is a most arrogant and homely upstart.

Mrs. DeVoe, an ambitious matron, desires to marry her daughter, Alice, a beautiful heiress, to Dickie Dewes, a priggish young man with a lineage. Alice objects and answers an advertisement inserted by the Humphs for a maid. She gets the position, meets Lord Drumleigh and they fall in love with each other. The lawyer now informs Humph who the chauffeur really is. Juliet and her parents become very deferential to him. He declares his intentions of marrying Alice, the maid, and she, surprising everyone, discloses herself to be an heiress in her own right.

CAPTAIN JENKS' DIPLOMACY (April 13).—Sir Brian, an irascible old gentleman, who suffers from gout, receives a note saying his son Gerald is very ill at college, and asking him to come to Dublin. He is too ill to go so he gets his friend, Captain Jenks, to go instead of him. Jenks finds Gerald being nursed by a pretty girl and soon discovers that Gerald is in love with her. On inquiry he finds her in every way worthy of him, but he is afraid of how Sir Brian will take it.

Gerald broaches the subject to his father and he flies into a furious rage and turns him out of the house. He will not listen to his friend Captain Jenks, when he tries to plead for them with him.

Gerald marries Mona and takes up literary work, assisted by Jenks. In course of time a son is born to Gerald and Mona, but Sir Brian will not become reconciled. Then he is taken very ill. A nurse is required and Captain Jenks contrives that Mona shall fill the position. Sir Brian admires her and learns to love her, and when she leaves, he asks her to come and see him. She returns with her child and tells him who she is. At this point Gerald enters the room and tells his father of his marriage. The heart of the old man is softened and he takes his grandson and daughter-in-law in his arms and is reconciled to Gerald, while Captain Jenks has the happiness of seeing the efficacy of his diplomacy.

CINES.

THE BRIGAND (April 9).—Jack, a dashing young fellow, resents the attentions of a soldier to Martha, his sweetheart. A quarrel ensues, and the officer is killed. To escape punishment Jack seeks safety with the brigands in the mountains.

One day he is seriously wounded in a skirmish, but is fortunately found by Martha and her father and taken to their farm.

The soldiers discover this fact, however, and a detachment comes to search the premises. By lowering the fugitive into the well, Martha and her father heroically manage to save him from capture. After many exciting adventures, the lovers succeed in leaving the country, and are finally married.

MADAME ROLAND (April 13).—Madame Roland, a woman of great personal charm and ability, was one of the most pitiable victims of that terrible uprising, the French Revolution. She is first seen scornfully rejecting the attentions of Viard, an unscrupulous fellow. Vowing vengeance, he brings charges of Royalist tendencies against her and her husband. The latter manages to make his escape, but she is arrested and taken before the Revolutionary Tribunal. There, the undaunted woman defends herself in such a manner that an acquittal is granted.

But Viard succeeds in having her arrested again upon a new charge. This time the fates are against her, and she is thrown into prison. From there she is taken on the "fatal cart" to the guillotine.

Surrounded by an angry mob of Revolutionists, she steps up to the guillotine, and, majestically bowing to the Statue of Liberty, cries out those famous words: "Oh, Liberty, what crimes are committed in thy name."

ECLIPSE.

THE SIGNAL THAT FAILED (April 10).—Pretty Lucille has two admirers, Marlowe, the commissary of the army, and Horace, the son of General Gerard. She favors the latter and the former vows vengeance. In the midst of a furious battle, Gerard receives word that the left wing of his army is being hard pressed. And the malicious Marlowe immediately rides to headquarters to report a total annihilation.

General Gerard is believed to have disgraced his country and is sentenced to death. The order is to be transmitted to the army by aerial signal. Hearing of this, Horace and his sweetheart bravely prevent the execution by destroying the signal apparatus, but are arrested and thrown into prison. Meanwhile the general turns the impending defeat into victory and triumphantly returns to liberate the courageous pair.

KALEM.

THE TIDE OF BATTLE (April 8).—The story opens with a reception given in honor of the Confederate volunteers. Hardee, a sturdy young lieutenant, bids good-bye to his sweetheart, Alisia, who is the elder daughter of Mr. John Stafford, a representative Southern gentleman. Alisia is inclined to be coquettish and does not take the young suitor seriously. As the officer leaves for the front, he little realizes that Mystie, the younger sister of Alisia, is deeply in love with him.

A few weeks later the Staffords receive word from Hardee that within a few weeks he expects to camp near their home. Mystie utters an exclamation of delight, but Alisia displays no interest. Shortly after the receipt of Hardee's message, the Federals occupy the land surrounding the Strafford estate and make their headquarters at the house.

Hardee, anxious to visit Alisia, volunteers to act as a spy and learn the plans of the Federals. He succeeds in penetrating the enemy's lines, but his hopes are shattered when he gazes through a window and sees Alisia receiving the caresses of Denby, the Federal captain. Consumed with jealousy, the Confederate is about to shoot Denby, when Mystie appears and speaks his name. Hardee then remembers his duty and becomes alert when Mystie relates the account of a proposed attack, which she has overheard. Hardee starts back for camp to warn his comrades, when he is discovered by a sentry and severely wounded.

How Mystie saves the object of her secret love and how the intrepid girl brings victory to the Confederates by her daring and strategy make a happy conclusion to this story.

A LEAP YEAR ELOPEMENT (April 10).—Archie's parents kept him indoors and thwarted his efforts to join in the pastimes of the young folks. There came a day, however, when Archie broke the yoke and joined a skating party. This being his first acquaintance with outdoor sport, he made an exhibition of himself when he attempted to glide over the ice and Nellie, the athletic girl, came to the rescue.

Nellie was also much impressed with Archie. She wrote him a note, stating that what he needed was exercise. He met her the next day and the young couple had an invigorating run over the country road.

Several subsequent meetings took place and all had to be conducted with stealth. Nellie finally proposed to Archie and placed the engagement ring upon his finger. Archie proudly exhibited the ring to his parents and announced that in the future he would call upon his fiancée as he pleased. Father proceeded to take drastic measures and imprisoned the young man in his room.

When Nellie found that her lover did not appear, she started forth to investigate. From his window he told her of his plight. She was equal to the occasion, however, and assisted him in descending to the ground. Then they sped away. The father, hearing the commotion, followed in pursuit, but the young couple entered an ice boat and father was obliged to engage an ice auto to keep in the running. Arriving at the minister's, the ceremony was soon performed and when father put in his appearance, he was induced to give his belated approval.

THE SECRET OF THE MISER'S CAVE (April 12).—Incongruous as it may seem, Pinto, the old miser, was quite pious and maintained a little altar in his room, where he worshiped. When no one was about, Pinto would enter his secret cave, through an entrance which the altar covered, and there he would gloat over his treasures.

The grim reaper finally summoned Pinto and as he was passing away he presented his house to the church, saying it could be used as a mission. As he was about to disclose the secret of his cave, his life departed.

Many years later, Tom Mitchell became foreman of the Thomas ranch. He won the heart of Lettie, the ranchman's daughter, which infuriated Angelo, who hoped to make the charming girl his own. Angelo bided his time and when Tom was sent out with gold to pay off the hands, Angelo and his accomplices overpowered the young man among the rocks and buried him alive. Returning to the ranch, Angelo announced that Tom was a thief and had fled with the money. Lettie was not inclined to believe him, but as the days passed and no word was received from Tom, the young woman listened to the wooing of Angelo.

Fortune is always an uncertain quantity. Tom found himself in the misers' cave and was able to keep alive by drinking the old wines stored therein. He determined to fight desperately for his line and his efforts were rewarded when he discovered the exit which led to the room above.

Lettie was about to be united in marriage with Angelo, when there was a sudden commotion in the room, as it was noticed that the altar began to move. The startled wedding guests saw a form emerge from the depths below and Tom stood before them. Angelo was terror-stricken when he beheld his victim standing before him and while the unscrupulous schemer was led off to prison, Tom was happily married to Lettie.

EDISON.

THE SPANISH CAVALIER—(April 19).—The story deals with the love of a Spanish cavalier for a wealthy senorita of noble birth. Across the pathway of these two moves the shadow of the Spanish Inquisition with all the cruelty and ignorant conception of misguided Christianity. This noble Castilian senorita is also wooed by one of the members of the Inquisition whose suit is favored by her father. But the fair maid refuses this dazzling offer of marriage and spurns the all-powerful master of the Inquisition. Revenge soon takes the place of love within his breast and his hired spies are set to work to watch the lady. Soon this fair daughter of Spain finds her maid arrested and through torture forced to accuse her mistress of the crime of heresy, which is brought about while her brave cavalier is away to the war. The daughter is arrested at the home of the good priest and brought for trial before the Inquisition. She is condemned.

The good priest brings the news of her plight to the cavalier and together they manage her escape. but not before the priest has sacrificed his life for the sake of the two lovers.

IS HE ELIGIBLE (April 10).—A wealthy merchant gives his son, Charles Reed, the junior partnership of his well-established business as a birthday gift, and at the same time advises the young man to marry and settle down. Young Reed decides to comply with his father's request. At a ball one evening he becomes very attentive to a fashionable young lady who introduces him to her mother, Mrs. Jankins. Subsequently he calls on the young lady with a view to matrimony. He finds her father most agreeable, but Mrs. Jenkins, a would-be society leader, proves to be a stumbling block.

Accordingly she secures the services of the Blinkerton Private Detective Agency, where a female detective is detailed to present herself at young Reed's private office in the guise of a stenographer, and secure a position. She proves herself proficient as well as charming and winsome. and ere long gains the ardent admiration of young Reed, who falls desperately in love with her.

At last Mrs. Jenkins receives the long looked for report on the young man's character, which she considers quite satisfactory. She now condescends to write young Reed a letter, urging him to call—but too late, for pending her investigation he has proposed and been accepted by the other girl. Shortly after, he is met by Jenkins himself, who drags him into the house, where, to his amazement he meeth his fiancée, who is attempting to collect three hundred dollars for services rendered. It now comes to light that young Reed and the female detective are engaged to be married—to the utter dismay of Mrs. Jenkins and her daughter.

CHURCH AND COUNTRY (April 12).—The story concerns itself with the change of heart of a young preacher, whose love of liberty is none the less strong because he feels that the cloth he wears precludes his active participation in the war or even his preaching violence to his congregation. Even the girl he loves turns her back upon him because he refuses to take the offered sword and fight for his country's freedom. And then the girl chances upon a plot for the capture of General Washington by the British forces, when he shall leave Valley Forge practically unaccompanied, for a short journey into York.

Slipping out of her father's tavern she looks about for a horse so that she may warn Washington. The young minister happens by and, of course, feels that it is a man's work, and, remounting his horse, dashes off across the country for the long ride to Valley Forge. He barely escapes death at the hands of a British sentry whom he passes on the road and loses his way, but finally arrives at Valley Forge to find that Washington had already started. Frantically he remounts his horse, although completely exhausted, and dashes off after the leader of the American army. And then we see a squad of British soldiers waiting in ambush for Washington's arrival, and, just before Washington reaches them the young minister catches up with him in time to turn the General about and prevent his capture.

At Valley Forge that night he sees Washington, apparently warming his hands over a camp fire, but really offering up a prayer for the cause of the Colonies, and the young minister's eyes are opened He sees that it is a righteous cause that Washington is both fighting and praying for.

He returns to his congregation and in a splendidly dramatic scene urges them to take up arms and fight for freedom, closing his discourse by tearing open his ministerial robes and disclosing the full uniform of a Continental solider. He calls for recruits, who are immediately forthcoming. Of course, the girl forgives him for any delay now that he has become a hero.

WINNIE'S DANCE (April 13).—Winnie with her fiance, Philip, attends an evening of amateur theatricals, in the middle of which Winnie leaves him, and, to his astonishment, appears upon the stage in a dance between the acts. Philip has a decided objection to seeing her appear in public, and after watching the dance for a few minutes his anger rises to such a height that he leaves the hall. After the entertainment congratulations are much in order, but Philip has not returned to present his. Consequently Winnie accepts the escort of four or five other young men and leaves the hall. Philip returns later and, finding her gone, realizes that his anger has made a breach.

The next day he looks at her photograph, charging it with many cruelties, but the face seems to smile at him and Philip falls before the all-conquering curve of the lips he loves. He writes a note asking forgiveness, and Winnie upon receiving it, hastens to reply by messenger, but in ringing for the messenger she accidentally pulls the fire alarm. When the firemen find no fire they angrily demand an explanation. She apologizes and explains her mistake. but the irate chief denounces her roundly. Once more her smile comes to her rescue and he capitulates even to the extent of offering to deliver the note to Philip.

Just at this minute Philip appears through the window, having seen the ladder put up there, and Winnie must again smile upon both men in order to restore peace between them. Of course Philip eventually gets her note and the firemen go away happy.

SELIG.

DARKFEATHER'S STRATEGY (April 8).—The Moosehide Indians, led by their valiant chief, Graywolf, depart from their village to wage war upon their old enemies, the Frazier Rivers. Arriving in their enemy's country, they go into camp, while Graywolf and Little Panther, one of his favorite warriors, ride out to reconnoitre. Coming unexpectedly upon their enemy, they wheel their horses and attempt to escape, but Graywolf falls from his horse wounded. Little Panther rescues him. Arriving in camp, the wounds of the chief are examined, and he is placed on a hastily improvised litter, and his braves return with him to their village. Raincloud, who loves and is loved by Graywolf's daughter, Darkfeather, is dispatched upon a perilous scouting expedition. She watches his departure with fearful forebodings of his safety. Little Panther becomes enamored with Darkfeather, and, taking his secret to the chief, who, wishing to show his gratitude to Little Panther for his rescue, gladly accedes to the request of his favorite warrior. Darkfeather learns of her betrothal by her father with great sorrow and dismay; she decides to seek her absent lover's help ere it is too late. She goes to the mountains to await his return, but is seen and followed by Little Panther, who surprises her in her vigil, and angrily demands her return to the village with him to become his squaw. She resists him with force. Raincloud, returning from his mission, hears her cries for help as she struggles with Little Panther, and quickly goes to her assistance. Little Panther resents the interference of Raincloud and they battle to the death. Raincloud is victorious in the combat. Leaving their fallen foe, he goes accompanied by Darkfeather to seek forgiveness of her father. The pardon is not forthcoming, however, and he is quickly seized and bound by his angry tribesmen, while they prepare to have him expiate his crime by burning at the stake. Darkfeather strategically frees him from his bonds and, while the attention of the Indians is detracted from their prisoner by the arrival of the body of Little Panther, Darkfeather secures a horse, and, dashing to the side of Raincloud, he leaps up behind her, and they dash away to freedom.

DRIFTWOOD (April 9).—Katherine Dalton finds herself alone in a big city without friends, funds or hope of employment. Because she dares to rebuff the affronts of a ward politician, she is forced to leave her cheap rooming house and is denied admission at the city lodgings. Tired and hungry she finally joins the "bread line"—that last resort of the city's unfortunate. Here she meets Bill Hickey, a human derelict through circumstance. While wandering along the snow-covered streets, in search of a place to sleep, they suddenly come face to face with another couple. The girls stare at each other in amazement. They are exact doubles. The men do not notice this. Hickey later reads in a newspaper of the reward being offered for the return of one Katherine Kent, a wealthy merchant's daughter, and description. Katherine recognizes her passerby of the street. Hungry and cold, she tells Hickey she is going to try to palm herself off as the missing heiress. They go to the house, but the imposition is discovered and Katherine's last chance for a place to sleep vanishes. They later find the missing girl and induce her to return to her parents. When Mr. Kent hears his daughter's story, his eyes are opened to the existing conditions and the human driftwood find at last food and shelter.

THE REDEMPTION OF "GREEK JOE" (April 11).—Jim Rossi, a young miner in the Big Drift mine, is in love with Mike Noonan's daughter Mary. Noonan also works in the Big Drift. Mary returns Jim's love and would marry him, but old Mike objects because of Jim's father, "Greek Joe," whom he despises. Old "Greek Joe," at one time an honest, well-thought-of, hard working chemist, is now little more than a shiftless, drunken, ne'er-do-well. Jim tries time and again to brace up his "dad," but his efforts are of no avail. Mike and "Greek Joe" meet outside the mine one day and come almost to blows. After this episode Jim is barred from Mike's home. That incident serves to awaken in old "Greek Joe" all the latent manhood remaining, and he decides to brace up. The next day a terrific explosion occurs in the Big Drift mine and when the toll is taken Jim and Mike are found to be imprisoned in the mine. The miners hunt for blasting explosives to blow away the obstruction which restrains the imprisoned men, but find it has been stolen. The situation is critical and all hope is abandoned for saving the two miners. Joe finally induces the officials to allow him to mix a chemical explosive and, with this, he blasts away the gigantic barrier. Mike forgets his stubborness and the young couple find much happiness, not only in their own future, but in that of the redeemed "Greek Joe."

WHEN THE HEART RULES (April 12).—John Peabody, a blasé old martinet, tiring of commercial life, offers his son George a partnership in the business. George, however, is in love with his study of art, and his model Winnifred. He thanks his father for the generous offer, but explains that he prefers to stick to his painting. The father calls at the studio of his son and in a frenzy, demolishes everything in sight, humiliating the model Winnifred, and mutilating the almost finished picture of Psyche, which George is working on.

Some five years later we see George, now happily married to Winnifred and the proud possessor of a promising son, at work in his modest studio and home. We also see old John alone in his mansion, his heart hungering for the boy whom he once called son.

Moved by memories of the past the old misanthrope offers from an unknown purchaser, through an art dealer, the sum of $1,000 for his son's "Mutilated Psyche." George receives the offer, and leaves to deliver the picture. Upon his return he finds that his beloved wife has died from heart failure.

The years roll on, George and his little son struggle on in the now ill-kept studio, while old John resides in lonely solitude in his costly mansion.

One day by accident George is run over in the street by a rich man's carriage and is sent to a hospital wrapped in the rich man's overcoat. Little John discovers a card in the overcoat bearing his name and wishing to know the where and whyfor, he returns the coat himself. Needless to say, little John discovers the rich man to be his grandfather, through the mutilated picture of his mother, which adorns the old man's mantel. The reconciliation is speedy and father and son turn all their efforts toward the future of little John.

BIOGRAPH.

FATE'S INTERCEPTION (April 8).—The representative of an American Syndicate comes to Mexico to look over some land. While there, he, out of sheer loneliness, pays considerable attention to the little Mexican girl, at whose home he is a roomer. The girl falls deeply in love with the American, who wins her absolute confidence. When the time comes for his departure, he of course cannot take her with him, and when he says good bye, she realizes how false were his promises. Her love for the Americano now turns to bitter hate, and she agrees to marry her erstwhile sweetheart, whom she threw aside for the American, if he will avenge her wrong. This he consents to do and so follows the American to a nearby town. A boom is on and the American leaves his room at the hotel to go to the Land Office on business, leaving the gas lighted until his return. The Mexican enters to wait, and not knowing anything about gas, blows it out so as to attack in the dark. When the American returns he finds that vengeance has gone awry. At the same time, the girl, who has repented her impulsiveness, enters and sees the result of it. Still, love was to blame, and the American makes all possible reparation.

THEIR FIRST KIDNAPPING CASE (April 11).—The two sleuths, upon returning from a well-earned vacation, are solicited to aid in unveiling the mystery of a case of kidnapping. They get upon what they believe to be the trail, only to find that they have tracked down a party of health officers in charge of a child with smallpox. Their reward is their being detained at the pest-house, fumigated and quarantined for fourteen days.

HELP! HELP! (April 11).—Mrs. Suburbanite reads in the morning paper that burglars have been operating in the neighborhood and is, of course, thrown into a panic of fear, which is greatly intensified by her seeing a couple of suspicious characters loitering about outside. She locks the door and hides the key in the window seat, only to see, a few minutes later, the curtains in a state of agitation. She telephones Mr. Suburbanite, "Help! Help! Burglars are breaking in," who, after a wild chase home, finds the cause of the trouble to be a toy poodle playing behind the curtains.

C. G. P. C,

LAUGHING GAS (April 9).—This picture is a scream from beginning to end, being the story of a man with a toothache, who goes to the dentist, and having been given gas, refuses to come out of it. This leads to many exceedingly funny situations, which will put you in a good humor for a whole month and make you forget even to be grouchy about this desperately delayed spring of ours.

ABRAHAM'S SACRIFICE (April 12).—This Bible story lends itself beautifully to cinematographic representation. The story of the great love of Abraham for his son Isaac, the command of Jehovah to sacrifice his son, Abraham's compliance with God's order and the angel's intervention at the last moment to prevent the actual sacrifice, is all beautifully shown in this highly interesting film. The subject is treated with the dignity it deserves and will impress this portion of biblical history on the mind of both young and old in an entirely novel and lasting manner.

PATHE.

THE TORN NOTE (April 10).—A young man, accused of a murder he did not commit, visits his sister to obtain money. His sister's husband witnesses him leaving by the window and suspects his wife. He drives his wife from the house with their infant child, but everything is explained finally and the husband makes amends for his unjust suspicions, and firmly resolvès in his heart never again to be carried away by blind passion and risk doing an irremediable injury to those he holds most dear in life.

THE GIRL SHERIFF (April 11).—A bandit who has been flirting with a young girl kills the sheriff in a fight. The girl turns out to be the sheriff's daughter and receiving a commission from the governor to fill her father's unexpired term, she succeeds in capturing the man with whom she has been carrying on a flirtation. To do this, however, she has had to shoot him. When his body falls lifeless to the ground, she pins a note on his sleeve asking that the reward offered for his capture be used in erecting a monument to her father's (the sheriff's) memory. She then ties the body of the dead bandit on the back of her own horse and the latter carries it back to town.

UNWELCOME LOVE (April 13).—A young girl in an office of a foundry is caught in the elevator shaft and rescued by one Burns. Burns loves the little girl truly, but the proprietor's daughter loves Burns, and being of a revengeful nature, she seeks to do all the harm she can to everyone who comes between her and Burns. Ultimately everything turns out for the better and Burns and the little girl are happily married.

MELIES.

THE SWASTIKA (April 18).—Young Elk, an educated Indian, is secretly in love with Sallie, daughter of a prosperous ranchman. But his case is hopeless because Sallie's affections are already bestowed on Tom, one of the cowboys. Tom, in turn, is loved by Wana, daughter of an Indian chief, and when he makes it plain to her that he is going to marry Sallie, the Indian girl plots revenge on Sallie.

The Indians demand whiskey and tobacco from Sallie's father, and when he refuses, they declare war on the white men; Elk, fearing for the safety of the one he loves, plans to protect Sallie without betraying his tribe. He overpowers her in the woods and with a knife imprints a mysterious sign on her forehead—the Swastikt—meaning in Indian language, "Under the protection of The Great Spirit." The cowboys arrest Elk for the seeming outrage and cast him into prison.

Later the Indians, led by Wana, take Sallie captive and threaten her life unless whiskey is furnished, when suddenly the Swastika sign is discovered on her forehead. Instantly she is released and given many presents. She meets the posse, out in search of her, and explains the meaning of the sign upon her forehead. They ride at once to the prison and not only free Elk, but bestow their thanks in fitting manner.

THE GHOST OF SULPHUR MOUNTAIN (April 18).—When Bob Stanley from New York arrives in Sulphur Mountain he gets mixed up in a fight with Jose, a Mexican, and is injured. Joe, a miner, takes Bob home where his wife dresses the wound, and offers him shelter until he shall become well. Joe mistakes Mary's sympathy for Bob for love and decides to put himself out of their way. He causes an explosion, at the mine, leaves his hat and coat and makes it appear as though he has been killed.

But Mary loves Joe, and her grief at his apparent loss is great. Six months later Joe, in rags and with beard, comes back to the scene of the explosion. But his mind does not recall everything perfectly, for in his brooding he has become mentally deranged. Miners see him, and believing him a ghost, flee in fear.

Bob heads a party to investigate the place of the reported apparation and in a most unexpected manner comes face to face with his old benefactor. The man's mind slowly regains balance and he remembers that he has a wife. Bob persuades him to come back, but as they approach the house they discover a doctor just leaving. Joe enters to find his wife still longing for him, and to share with her the joy that has just come to them both—an offspring.

Sound, Substantial Reasons

For the Pre-eminent Position of

The MOTIOGRAPH

What is the reason of that mysterious enthusiasm which makes every one speak in high praise of the MOTIOGRAPH?

What peculiar qualities does it possess, which impel the exhibitor to dismiss the suggestion that others are "as good"?

We can trace the cause by taking, as an example, one little fact: Every part and every screw is interchangeable with every other part and every other screw.

Accurate dimensions in MOTIOGRAPH parts means elimination of friction and extraordinary ease of operation---besides assuring freedom from worry and "up-keep" expense.

CHAMPION.

A CARICATURE OF A FACE (April 8).—Mr. George Fattie, proposes to and is accepted by his secretary, but he makes one condition of her acceptance, and that is there should be no mother-in-law in his house. This is a heart blow to the girl, but her mother tells her to never fear, for she'll concoct a plan whereby he'll receive her with open arms. Gladly and with joy, after the honeymoon of the Fatties, the mother and daughter get together on a plot. An artist's studio is visited and an order given to that gentleman for a dozen caricatures of the lady. The artist fulfills the order and the result is a dozen highly amusing and ridiculous caricatures.

In a weak moment, Mr. Fattie consents to permit the portrait of his wife's mother to be admitted to his home. Then suddenly he beholds from point of vantage, a face looking down on him—and such a face! Then one day he meets the original and the original was nothing like "that face," so he did not recognize her.

Later on, the original insisted on coming into his home. This he didn't want, because he had met her as a sweet thing, and didn't want his wife to get on to his flirtatious conduct. But the sweet thing insisted and he had to make the best of it—and introduced the sweet thing as his sister. Then the wife slipped forward and said, "This is my mother," and then Mr. Fattie collapsed.

THE BLUE MOUNTAIN BUFFALOES (April 8).—The Buffalo herd taken on the Blue Mountain Forest Reservation is one of the most interesting pictures of animal life ever presented, inasmuch as we are given a glimpse of the last sad remnants of what was once the pride of this continent, the mighty monarchs of the plains. The herd has been photographed close up in their New Hampshire winter quarters, that we may study with sad interest the noble creatures.

SALVATION SUE (April 10).—Jimmy Morgan is the scion of a wealthy father, but Bohemianism gets hold of him and he usually spends his monthly allowance to buy drinks for "the boys." One day, Mr. Morgan determines to end this state of affairs, and he tersely tells Jimmy to "get out and stay out" until he can sober up and be a credit to himself. Jimmy doesn't take this very seriously, so he immediately repairs to his favorite barroom, where he has a fine old time with the boys.

Sue Brown, a Salvation Army lassie, is collecting pennies when one of the half-drunken rowdies insults her. Jimmy knocks the fellow down and escorts Sue to the door, whereupon she thanks her "big brother" and disappears. Jimmy sinks lower and lower until within a month he is a bum. One day he is helped by Mr. Dorner, an aristocratic old philanthropist. Later, Sue sees an old lady run down by an auto and assists her. The lady insists on Sue accompanying her home and nursing her. She is Mrs. Dorner, the wife of the old gentleman who has assisted Jimmy.

Mr. and Mrs. Dorner and Sue become great friends. While Sue and Mr. Dorner are going their charitable rounds, they visit a very tough dive whereat Jimmy hangs out. Jimmy is asleep at a table and many toughs are idling about. In the brief moment that Sue is absent they set upon and rob Mr. Dorner. Jimmy awakens and tries to protect Mr. Dorner, but is beaten into insensibility.

Mr. Dorner and Sue then take Jimmy to the Dorner home, where he is given medical attention and brought around. Sue learns Jimmy's story and out of heartfelt sympathy for him, she goes to his father and pleads for Jimmy's forgiveness. At first Mr. Morgan is obdurate, but finally consents. All ends happily and congratulations are in order when Mrs. Dorner notices that Jimmy and Sue are oblivious of their presence. The old couple tiptoe out of the room and peek in, to find the boy and girl in each other's arms.

BRADHURST FIELD CLUB FOUR MILE RUN (April 8).—On the evening of Saturday, March 9th, the Bradhurst Field Club of New York City had a four-mile run, which attracted a record entry of 500 and an actual starting list of over 330. The race was a handicap for a series of valuable prizes to which the Imp Flms Company donated a silver cup for the first team home.

Prominent amongst the competitors were several winners who are to compete in the Olympic Games at Stockholm next July. The following clubs entered teams: New York A. C., Irish-American, Long Island A. C., Glencoes, Pastimes, Xaviers, Mohawks, Trinitys, Morningsides, Mott Haven, and others.

The winner was Jack Gleason, of the Pastime A. C., with a handicap of 1 minute 40 seconds. Kramer, of the Long Island A. C., champion, was amongst the runners and did fast time. MacNamara, of the Irish-Americans, did the distance in 20.46, which was amateur record for the course. First team honors were won by the Morningside A. C. The reel includes pictures of Johnny Hayes, who is training several of the American contestants for the Olympic games.

FALSE TO BROTHER (April 11).—This story relates how two young men left the East for the West on the chance of returning with sufficient money to marry the girl they each loved. Each swain had his sweetheart's photograph, but unknown to the other the photograph was that of the same girl. The men for a time are estranged, because each suspects the other of stealing his sweetheart. But in the end it develops that the girl marries a third party. So in their disappointment the two young miners become great chums.

THE SECTION FOREMAN (April 8).—Edward Eagan is the foreman of a section gang on a steam railroad. The story opens with him at home at the bedside of his wife, who is dangerously ill. A physician is called and, leaving his wife with the doctor, Eagan goes out and proceeds up the track with his men to their work. The wife becomes worse and the physician decides to telegraph for the husband. He does so, and the message is delivered to Eagan. Eagan gives his men instructions and rides swiftly in the direction of his home.

While proceeding his machine is derailed. He stops and notices that the rails have spread. The fast express is about due. Eagan hesitates and his mind is filled with conflicting emotions. Placing the car on the track, he races back and summons his men. They repair the track just as the fast express rushes pass. Hastily bidding his men return to their work up the track, Eagan again mounts the vehicle and stars for home. He has his reward, for the faithful doctor, who has not left the side of the wife, allays his fears and pronounces her out of danger.

A LEAP FOR LOVE (April 13).—Arthur Law and Samuel Kingston are both aspirants for the hand of Marguerite Leonard. Kingston, however, is the favored one until he seems to be a coward in the eyes of his sweetheart. He proposes to Marguerite during the progress of a dance at her home. She accepts him and the betrothal is overheard by Law, who in a moment of passion quarrels with Kingston and strikes him. The latter, remembering the respect he owes his hostess, restrains his anger and refuses to retaliate. Cowardice is despised by the pretty Marguerite, and she breaks off the engagement. The rumor of lack of courage reaches his club, and when he arrives there, he is shunned by his fellow members.

Margerie, while on Brooglyn Bridge with young Law, looks down at the river below and in a flippant mood dares Law to leap over, even with the aid of a parachute. Law is piqued by her dare and tells his friends at the club, who make the attempt interesting for him by putting up a liberal amount of money that he will not do it. Kingston overhears the conversation and arranges to be on the boat the day the leap is made.

Law has his parachute on the bridge and he makes the jump successfully. After reaching the water, however, he is seized with a cramp and is within an ace of sinking when Kingston throws off his coat, forgetting the wrong that the drowning man has done him, and leaps to his rescue. They are both pulled up on the boat and when the exhausted man recovers his senses, he apologizes to Kingston, and thanks him for his bravery. Marguerite then realizes her mistake, and knows she cares for him alone.

MR. SMITH, BARBER (April 13).—Smith was of a sporting turn of mind, but his wife kept him thoroughly under control. Still when a man decides to deceive his better half for the purpose of getting a night off with the boys, he is generally equal to the emergency. So when Smith received a message and note from the friend whom he was shaving that a good time awaited him at the Cozy Corner Club, he arranged with the said friend to send him, Smith, a bogus telegram calling him out of town.

So Smith's wife dutifully saw hubby off to the depot and loyally returned to take Smith's place in the barber shop, whilst he was absent. A customer came in to be shaved. Mrs. Smith donned her husband's working jacket and before she had completed her task, accidently placed her hand in the pocket of the jacket, and discovered, not the telegram, which called her husband away, but a note signed "Jessie," inviting Smith to take a friend to the Cozy Corner Club that night. Mrs. Smith thereupon resolved to see things through and chooses for her plan that of disguising herself as a man. In this aspect she makes her entrance into the Cozy Corner Club, picks a quarrel with her husband, fights a duel with him, and when the hubbub is at its height, throws off her disguise and reveals herself. Thus Mrs. Smith cures her husband of his disagreeable habit of "lying in order to make himself a holiday."

NESTOR.

THE HEART OF A TRAMP (April 1).—Henry Fortman's automobile comes to a sudden stop and it's a long way home. Fortunately, there is a young tramp in the vicinity. The tramp goes to work with a vim, and the car is soon able to go on its journey. Fortman hires the tramp as his chauffeur.

"Dick," as the ex-tramp chooses to be called, looks mighty handsome and disgingué when thoroughly cleaned up and appareled in decent clothes. Thus transformed, he is presented to Mrs. Fortman. She soon becomes infatuated with the dashing young man, and later, what seemed to be but a passing fancy, changes into love.

Mrs. Fortman's love and tenderness are wasted upon desert air, for "Dick," whose heart is in the right place, remembers his benefactor and gently but firmly repulses her caresses. The woman's unwelcome attentions finally come to her husband's notice. While he debates as to whether he should discard her, "Dick" leaves a note behind and returns to the country, the open air, and the life of Trampdom.

TWO MEN AND THE LAW (April 3).—Tim, an outlaw, is entirely unsuspected, even by his best friend, the sheriff. Tim has always worn a disguise and he has shown it to but one person, Josie, the girl he loves, and who promises to marry him as soon as he turns over a new page. Josie lives with her Uncle Ben, owner of a gambling house. Tim writes her to be ready to marry him at once, as he has tackled his last job. It is the robbing of a bank, and the sheriff, who is home indulging in his favorite pastime of cards, is notified and starts out to trace the robber. He divides his men, himself setting out alone, but Tim has gotten a good start and, after taking off his disguise, he rides up to the gambling house, which Ben keeps, and secures a room for the night. As this gambling house is also a hotel, the tired sheriff also arrives and asks for a room and is told that all of the rooms are taken, but that he can bunk with Tim. He is quite satisfied and goes to bed. The next morning, however, he awakens first and is astonished to see Tim's disguise lying near his friend's bed. Upon close examination, he is satisfied that Tim has robbed the bank, as the money is in a small satchel with Tim's tools. He takes Tim's gun and commands him to surrender. Tim, taken wholly by surprise, is forced to do so, but pleads with the sheriff not to hand-cuff him or tell the people of the hotel, and he will accompany the sheriff quietly. The sheriff agrees and the men go down to breakfast, after which, much against Tim's advice, the sheriff enters the gambling room and starts to play. Cards are his one great weakness and, when once started, he plays on and on. Noon, evening, and midnight come and he never stops until not only his own money, but that which Tim returned to him from the bank is swept away. Tim finally gets the sheriff to their room, and urges him to drink. After the sheriff has fallen asleep and the gambling room closed for the night. Tim takes the sheriff's gun and his own tools and creeps cautiously down [illegible] blows the safe, secures the money that the sheriff lost and which belonged to the bank, and returns to his room. In the hall he meets Josie. Tim tells her what he has done and that he is returning the money to the sheriff. He enters his room, and writes a note, telling the sheriff to return the money to the bank and not to make a fool of himself again, after which he meets Josie again, and together they go away to commence life anew.

THE CUB REPORTER'S BIG SCOOP (April 6).—Thanks to the star reporter's absence, Jack Hunter, the "Cub," is assigned to interview the big sugar merchant, Henry Ford, at his country home. At the depot, he finds that a good two-mile walk separates him from the Ford mansion.

Alice Ford, the sugar magnate's daughter, is on the way to Mabel Smith's house. On a deserted road a footpad attempts to relieve Alice of her purse. The cub reporter arrives at the psychological moment and Mr. Highwayman meets his Waterloo. Alice thanks Jack and then continues on her journey. The "Cub" at last reaches his destination. A bitter disappointment awaits him. The blustering old man positively detests interviews and has no love for reporters. Disheartened and defeated, he returns to the depot, but ill-luck still pursues him—the last train has gone. Duty compels him to report to the city editor and a hunt for a telephone follows. The railroad station being closed, the nearest and only available phone is at Smith's. Thither he goes. The ringing of the bell frightens the girls. Mabel furnishes Alice with the family revolver, and tremblingly they await developments. Jack is determined to phone and he reconnoiters. If he cannot enter via the doors, why not tackle the window? He tackles it and the girls hold him up. The telephone is used, but to summon the town constable. By the time the law's representative arrives, Jack and Alice have renewed their acquaintance and are quite friendly, much to Mabel's displeasure. Alice 'phones her father and "swipes" the interview for the "Cub."

The big scoop earns Jack a salary increase, and his able write-up of the sugar deal mollifies Mr. Ford, who finally agrees to say: "Bless you, my children."

THANHOUSER.

A LOVE OF LONG AGO (April 9).—In one of the rural sections of Spain, they tell a story, handed down from generation to generation, of the brave soldier Pedro, and the sacrifice he made for his lady fair.

He was only an humble soldier, stationed at a fort, and he loved a maiden who lived in a village nearby. The girl liked him, and perhaps might have married him, had the "other man" not appeared.

The other was a stranger, who suddenly appeared in the village, and secured lodgings with the girl's mother. He quickly won the maiden's love, and they were planning to get married, when he was arrested. It happened that Pedro was the one who took him into custody, and he then learned for the first time that the girl's heart belonged to the other man.

At the fort the stranger was questioned, the belief being that he was a spy, but no documents were found in his possession. The commander of the garrison simply ordered him detained, and did not lock him in a cell. The stranger's case was desperate, however, for he really was what he was suspected of being—a spy. The girl determined to rescue him, and shot an arrow over the ramparts at night. A light cord was attached to the arrow, and to this in turn was tied a heavy rope, by means of which the prisoner could escape.

The plan worked successfully until the stranger was just starting on his perilous journey. Then Pedro discovered what was happening, and with a cry of alarm, ran forward with drawn sword. He raised his blade to cut the rope, but glancing down, saw the girl he loved, her arms raised appealingly to him. He realized that his rival's life was in his hands, and started to strike. Then, like a flash, he saw that upon him depended the girl's happiness, and he could not. On the contrary, he held back the other soldiers who would have killed the stranger, was denounced as a traitor, and finally, fighting to the last gasp, fell, supposedly dead, into the sea.

Years later, in a religious retreat, an aged monk, loved and venerated by all who knew him, died. Then the story, long a secret, was told to the world. Pedro was not killed, but narrowly escaped. He was found unconscious, washed up on the beach by a monk, who nursed him back to health and strength. Later he joined the order, and became one of its devout members.

AN EASY MARK (April 12).—She was rich and a good business woman, but she didn't look it. Her home in the country was comfortably furnished, and she lived there for choice, although property in the city was in her name. One building she owned was a city mansion, and the necessity of collecting the rent induced her to take a trip to the metropolis.

Crossing a crowded thoroughfare, she became confused, but was rescued by a polite young man, who, finding her rather upset by her experience, volunteered to escort her to her lawyer's office. There he saw a large sum of money paid over to her, and at once grew to like her the more.

The fact was that the young man was a crook, and saw a chance to make some easy money. The woman, who had taken a fancy to him, decided to be his "fairy Godmother," intending to test him out, and if he proved worthy to put him in the way of making his fortune. She was feeling most benevolent that day, and could see a popular story book ending to what promised to be a very ordinary adventure. So she listened while he told her of an excellent and cheap boarding house, went to the place with him, and was well pleased with her reception there.

The dishonest young man devoted much time to planning a way to relieve "the easy mark" of her wealth. Some were dangerous, others he regarded as "too coarse." Then Dame Fortune threw a chance in his way and he accepted it gratefully.

He found the keys of a stylish mansion, and soon proved to his satisfaction that the owner had gone abroad, and that the place was untenanted. Se he went to the woman from the country and offered her a bargain in real estate, and strangely enough the price was within her means.

It was so easy to swindle the rural visitor that as he told his pal, the boarding-house keeper, it was "like taking water from the ocean." He gave her a deed, accepted her money, and expected to be happy while it lasted.

There was one little flaw in his yarn, one fact he had overlooked and it aroused the suspicion of the "easy mark." In the very moment of victory he met defeat, and went to prison, angry at himself, the grieving because dishonesty had cost him the best chance he had ever had to make a fortune.

AMERICAN.

FIDELITY (March 25).—A faithful, devoted husband accidentally kills a man. The sentence of the court consigns him to a long term in prison. The picture swings to the wife—alone, faithful, struggling to support herself and child, and beset by an old time suitor. The suitor nearly wins—and then something happens. What and how makes an exceptionally fine reel that will appeal strongly to the sympathies of your audience.

WINTER SPORTS AND PASTIMES OF CORONADO BEACH (March 28).—You want to see beautiful Coronado—everyone does. But if you cannot see Southern California with your own eyes then see it through the eye of the motion picture camera. There's boat and auto racing, an exciting polo game, swimming races, etc.—and all on New Year's Day, 1912. Those who have never seen Southern California in the winter time will enjoy it—those more fortunate will find it equally enjoyable.

THE MAID AND THE MAN (April 1).—A tale of a wealthy bachelor, good-looking young ranchman, who went to a fashionable resort in search of adventure. And he found it—in double doses—along with a match-making mother, a scheming stock shark and a parlor maid.

THE AGITATOR (April 4).—While the foreman is absent in the city, with a train load of cattle, the ranch owner, finding himself short of men, employs a new hand. Young and extremely handsome, with a fine personality, Jack Williams makes quite an impression on the ranchowner's daughters, and he is himself attracted to the elder sister.

During his absence the foreman becomes inflamed with socialistic ideas by attending socialistic gatherings and listening to impassioned speeches by hot-headed men. He returns to the ranch with his head full of socialism and finds that the new ranch hand has made great headway with the ranchowner's daughter, whom he had hoped to win himself. He attempts to force his attentions on her, but finds them unwelcome, and when he carries it to the point of rudeness her father interferes, thereby gaining his foreman's enmity.

In order to retaliate for his suffered grievance he stirs up the cowboys with whiskey and talk gleaned from socialistic meetings.

Under his leadership the boys are ready to fight and in this dangerous mood the foreman leads a delegation to the ranchman with a demand that he divide his wealth equally among them. Reasoning and argument do not avail and the ranchman finds that of all his employees Jack Williams is the only one that remains loyal.

Finding that their demands are not complied with the cowboys prepare to fight and a desperate battle takes place between the gang, the ranch owner and Jack. The wife and daughters witness the fight and see the father wounded. Jack leads them all to a pit where they will be safe, and continues the fight alone.

A stray bullet strikes the foreman, and without a leader the cowboys soon see their folly, and hostilities cease. Jack finds that his brave defence of her father's home, has convinced the girl that he could defend one of his own and they make their plans accordingly.

CHECKMATE (April 8).—When George Grey invited his old college chum, Jim Blackwell, to Chicago, George, of course, had but little idea of the radical change that the years had made in Jim's nature or the fact that Jim had become decidedly handsome. So one day, fresh from the East, Jim blew into George's office, and a grand old reunion took place. George, of course, wanted to show Jim all the sights of his city, and naturally one of the chief sights was George's best girl. They telephoned to a little French restaurant to hold a table for them. They then repaired to George's rooms, where full dress suits were donned, and the two old friends made straightway for the home of George's best girl, Grace Harcourt. Here they were received with much pomp by the charming Miss Harcourt, who welcomed them into the library. George did not quite like the way in which Grace looked at Jim. When Jim offered to play and when Grace stood over him at the piano and they togther sang sentimental songs, George's patience began to ebb. This unfortunate state of mind was further augmented when Grace refused to answer his questions and became so interested in the conversation of his chum that she seemed oblivious to anything else in the room.

After several desperate attempts to introduce himself into the conversation, George seized his hat and coat and fled in dismay and disgust.

Meantime, Jim and Grace progressed nicely. Jim thought of the table reserved at the French restaurant, and insisted that Grace and he carry out the engagement. At the same time George was suddenly seized with an idea. He entered a telegraph office and wired a message to Jim in care of Café Noir.

Jim and Grace, reaching the café, were in the midst of a most loving tete-a-tete when the head waiter unexpectedly handed a telegram to Jim. He opened it, gasped in amazement and fainted dead away. Grace, thinking some serious calamity had befallen him, grasped the telegram and read the following message: "Twins arrived to-day. Your wife doing well."

RANCHMAN'S MARATHON (April 8).—Charley Wacher and Bob Culver were both madly enraptured with pretty Polly Daniels. They did not take young John Beverly into consideration, but Polly certainly did. When approached on the subject, Polly complained that both Wacher and Culver were much too old. This so wrought up Culver and Wacher that they decided to do a marathon. The one who could run the longest was to receive the hand of the gracious Miss Polly. So they started.

Meantime young John Beverly seized the elusive Polly and rushed her away to the minister. On their return, they met the two marathon runners, and informed them of the marriage.

LETTER WITH THE BLACK SEALS (April 2).—When Uncle Bill passed away in the little cabin out West, all his old comrades and friends mourned his death, especially his little pal, "Kid," whom he loved as his own child. Before he died, the old man entrusted to "Kid" the delivery of his will to his niece, Kittie in New York. This will disinherits an ungrateful nephew and leaves the old man's wealth to the girl.

The nephew, learning of his ill fortune, tries to marry Kittie and when she refuses, carries her off to the rendezvous of the "Silk Mask Band," where she is finally traced by "Kid" and his pal "Kit" who have reached New York with the will. By a clever ruse, the boy hero places a decoy and rescues Kittie, the Silk Mask Band escaping in an auto, which, owing to a disengaged brake, plunges into the Hudson river.

WHITE APRONS (April 4).—A domestic science school boasts of its pretty teacher and prettier pupils. Ralph Brown, the superintendent, falls victim to the charms of Miss Beth, the teacher. Ralph becomes a dyspeptic from eating delicacies made at the school and his doctor prescribes a change of diet. Still the products of the school pour in and the distracted superintendent decides to quietly bury them in the back yard. Miss Beth, unfortunately, uses the same plot of ground to promote the growth of celery plants and when she and her class go to inspect them, finds on digging up the celery, a stack of the school's best mince pies adhering to the roots. Then the fun begins and Ralph's troubles with it. The doctor's prescription is called in to save him from the ire of the pupils and tearful Miss Beth, who finally accepts the inevitable and Ralph.

THE LAND OF DARKNESS (April 7).—Realizing that she is about to die, the mother of Claire Lenoir writes a pathetic letter to her sister, Mme. Drouard, who is a widow and lives with her only son, Louis, a workman in the mines. She implores her sister to take care of her daughter. The mother and son are inclined to welcome the poor child with tenderness.

Louis is deeply impressed with the charm of his cousin. He has a friend, Charles Marcourt, a miner like himself. He, also, is charmed by the beauty of Claire. Although he is confident of Louis' love, he cannot resist the impulse. He makes love to her in very ardent manner, asking her to marry him. She repulses Charles. Louis will be her husband.

The engagement day arrives. Charles cannot endure the happiness of his rival. Suddenly he rises and goes in the direction of the river He wants to die. Claire pursues the young man and reaching him at the water's edge, stops him from carrying out his fatal intentions.

In a sisterly manner, she pleads with him. Louis observes them while thus engaged, and misjudges the presence of his betrothed near Charles. Jealousy arises between the two men and a spirit of hatred is engendered. The hate engendered in the hearts of the two rivals continues to the bottom of the mines. The company's engineer, in making his daily tour of inspection detects the presence of fire damp and warns the workmen to leave the mine. He further advises them against opening their lamps.

Following his departure, the miners are shown leaving the mine. However the two rivals engage in an altercation and in the struggle which ensues a lamp is broken. A terrific explosion follows. Louis is uninjured but Charles is rendered helpless. Louis picks up Charles and desperately struggles on in an effort to reach a haven of safety.

The frantic miners dart here and there through dark passages and holes, while many are overcome and left dying behind. Louis is impeded in his progress by the helpless burden he carries and makes little headway. Suddenly an underground lake bursts through the shattered walls of the mine and the passageways are flooded with water. The only opening to the stairs is cut off by the deluge before Charles and Louis can escape and they are left alone with the rising tide. The wounded rival is tenderly supported by Charles who, swimming through the muddy water, succeeds in reaching a ledge where for a time they are safe.

Meanwhile the town is thrown into confusion. The dead and wounded are placed in one of the buildings nearby and there tears of joy for the living mingle with grief-stricken sobs of anguish for the dead. Claire and her aunt are among those who search the faces of the dead. The engineer bravely volunteers to take a body of men to the bottom of the mine. After penetrating many dangerous passageways the engineer finally reaches the walled-in cavity where Charles and Louis were last seen. Here they begin to dig. Louis and Charles, deprived of food and water are becoming slowly exhausted. Suddenly a faint tapping sound is borne to their ears and a wild hope that rescue is near at hand takes possession of them. With all his remaining strength, Louis picks up a piece of timber and pounds on the walls of their prison. Then they wait for an answer. They hear the responsive signal of the rescuers. In vain does Louis implore his dying friend to bear up a little longer. Charles has passed to the Great Beyond praying that Louis might be saved.

The rescuers approach nearer and nearer the imprisoned miners. Meanwhile Louis is becoming weaker and weaker. No longer is he able to answer the signals of the engineer. Outside, the rescuing party finally succeed in breaking through the wall. The engineer is the first to crawl through the opening and by the light of his lamp finds their task has been for naught. Charles and Louis are still in death.

Sadly and reverently their brother miners remove the bodies to the surface where they are tenderly laid in the chapel surrounded by lighted candles and flowers. Carefully the sad news is broken to Claire and her aunt. At the little chapel all is still and quiet save the sobs of the sorrowing.

Here the young orphan comes to mourn those who loved her too well. The engineer tenderly assures Claire of his respect and friendship and she feels a sense of protection stealing over her as she looks into his brave and honest face. That he proved a loyal and devoted husband to the orphaned girl in after years is a fact no one can deny.

LITTLE HANDS (April 9).—An escaping prisoner is befriended by a kind old lady whose little grandchild wins his heart. After struggling against the world's prejudices, to make an honest livelihood, he yields to the temptation of two old cronies. They burglarize a house, which proves to be that of his benefactress. The little child, as he enters, recognizes him with glee and through the "little hands" stretched out to him he is raised to a better manhood, and resolves to prove his worthiness for freedom and success.

A LUCKY HOLDUP (April 11).—Two brokers, partners, have a quarrel over some trivial matter and separate; they meet at a dance. Their son and daughter who are very fond of each other, are dancing together when their parents see them and forbid them to talk to one another. They plan to elope. With very little money, they go to the mountains; after two weeks they are broke. They engage with a stage driver to take them to his cabin till they are ready to go home. The driver holds them up. He finds only a dollar and turns away in disgust. The young couple conceive the idea of sending a letter to their parents to send a sum of money to the stage driver as a ransom, which is done. The two partners agree to unite in an effort to save their children. The story is carried on to a laughable conclusion.

MAJESTIC.

A DANGEROUS MODEL (April 7).—John Gray finds himself in dire need of two thousand dollars, and, by the irony of fate, he and his wife are about to attend a masquerade ball. Mrs. Chesterfield, a rich friend of the Grays, lends Mrs. Gray a diamond necklace to add to the attractiveness of her costume. Overcome by temptation, Gray takes the necklace and pawns it, being sure that he will need the money only for a day.

Gray's speculations prosper, and when his wife misses the gems, he confesses that he has borrowed them. Unfortunately he drops the pawn ticket, and it is found by Chester Devoe, an artist, who is devoted to Mrs. Gray. The wife goes to the ball, expecting her husband to come, with the necklace, and there she meets Devoe, who, with the pawn ticket as evidence, threatens exposure if she does not accept his attentions. When Gray appears, he is infuriated by Devoe's devotion to his wife, which she dares not resent.

The next day the artist summons her to his studio, a summons she obeys, in hope of recovering the pawn ticket. Devoe is absent, for the moment, and a hasty search fails to reveal the ticket to the distracted woman. To further her search she hastily takes the place and assumes the costume of a model, which Devoe has been sketching. Devoe enters, the worse for liquor, and resumes his sketching of the supposed model.

Gray, who has learned of his wife's visit, comes to the studio. Devoe denies that Mrs. Gray is there. Gray attacks him, and, in the combat that ensues, is about to be shot by Devoe, when Mrs. Gray, losing her character of a model, wrests the revolver from the artist. After a hasty explanation, Devoe is forced to return the pawn ticket, and the husband and wife depart, leaving the befuddled artist to his reflections.

A WARRIOR BOLD (April 9).—If Dick had not been so fond of Helen, and she had not been so fond of soldiers, he probably would have escaped an embarrasing, if humorous predicament. But it certainly was trying when he had called and was monopolizing Helen's attention to have Tom and Joe appear, Tom in his militia lieutenant's uniform. Of course Tom received all of Helen's attention, and was not slow to take advantage of the situation. So Dick sadly took his leave, followed by Joe, and went to Tom's room, there to await the conquering hero.

Dick bewailed his fate to his two friends, and a brilliant idea came to Tom, by which Dick could gain favor with the lady. So Tom suggested that Dick borrow his uniform, present himself to Helen, on the morrow, tell her he had joined the militia, and after winning her, trust to her love to forgive the deception.

The next evening Dick presents himself at Tom's room, where Tom and Joe await him, arrays himself in the uniform, and starts gaily forth on his quest. Then the wicked Tom writes a note, saying that he is called to the armory, and must have the uniform at once and intrusts it to the husky janitor, with instructions to return with the uniform at all hazards.

Dick duly presents himself to Helen, who is surprised and delighted at his warlike appearance. But as he is regaling her with the deeds of daring he is going to perform, in comes the janitor, with the fatal note. Naturally Dick demurs at shedding his new-found glory, especially as there is nothing else on the premises for him to wear. He begs Helen to leave him with the janitor for a few minutes. He protests to that worthy, who loses his temper, and proceeds to divest Dick of the uniform and poor Dick is forced to take refuge in an ornamental suit of armor in the room.

From this moment Dick's troubles come thick and fast. Helen returns, is surprised at his absence, while he remains rigid in the armor. Tom and Joe call to see how their ruse has succeeded. They are apprised of his presence in the armor by receiving a kick and a punch from the supposed ornament. They turn to the unconscious Helen, ask if they may borrow the armor to wear to a masquerade and proceed to carry poor Dick out and roll him ignominiously down stairs, there to wait until called for.

Fortunately for Dick, a burglar, or "second-story" man appears shortly on his nefarious mission. Dick promptly throws his arms around the burglar, and at the point of his own revolver, forces him to exchange his shabby clothes for the armor, telling the burglar that all will be well with him if he follows instructions. Dick returns to Tom's room, secures the uniform and returns clad in it, to Helen's house. He returns the burglar's clothes, instructs him to make a noise presently, whereupon Dick will appear and engage him in combat, in which Dick is to be the conqueror.

When Dick reappears in the drawing-room, in the uniform, and explains that he has been called away on riot duty, Tom and Joe are dumbfounded, and Helen is greatly pleased. When a noise is heard below, Dick assures the others that he will protect them, dashes down, and engages in a furious fight with the burglar. He is the victor, but refuses to take advantage of a conquered foe, gives him money, and allows him to depart. Helen turns adoringly to Dick and Tom and Joe congratulate him heartily, although they do not know how he has tricked them.

POWERS

MEETING HIS MATCH (April 9).—Nelson is peevish in nature and has always been a tyrant in his own office. He discharges stenographer after stenographer for one trifling reason after another and all in his employ fear him, with the exception of Jimmy, his office boy, who is as fresh as green paint and has a skin like a rhinocerous. Then Mary Blake comes to work for Nelson and, being the sworn enemy of all tyrants, both large and small, she proceeds to give him a practical lesson in the proper way to treat one's help. It is needless to say that she is aided in her endeavors by the ever ready Jimmy. The result is that Nelson soon loses his job as tyrant and becomes a slave—and Mary's slave at that, and Jimmy does not lose his job either, although he richly deserves it.

THE WAYS OF MEN (Mar. 13).—Harry and Jack are chums, but the inevitable woman comes between them; they have a bitter quarrel over Mary. Jack marries her and the two men drift apart.

A year later, Jack and May have a child born to them and they ought to be happy, but instead, are plunged into misery, owing to the abject poverty to which they have been reduced.

Driven to desperation, Jack, against Mary's wishes, appeals to his former chum for aid for his starving wife and child. Harry, who has become a wealthy man, remembers only the wrong Jack once did him in taking from him the woman he loved, and he drives Jack from his office, empty-handed.

But Fate works strange changes and before many years these two men meet again, but under entirely altered circumstances, and Jack is proven in no wise more forgiving nor charitable than was Harry.

LUX.

BILL BECOMES MENTALLY DERANGED (April 5).—Bill suddenly becomes childish and delights in all the pranks of his boyhood days. His wife calls a doctor in and it is found that poor Bill has water on the brain. A sensational operation is performed, and comes off successfully mid much fun. The childlike innocence of silly Bill is a masterpiece of splendid comedy acting, and will cause shrieks of laughter.

AN ENJOYABLE RIDE (April 5).—A young wife is suddenly seized with grave misgivings as to her husband's fidelity. She follows him only to have her suspicions confirmed. She exchanges clothes with a lady cabdriver and waits outside the restaurant which she observed her husband enter in company with another lady. When hubby comes out and calls for a cab and takes his lady friend for a drive, he is made to feel the weight of his wife's wrath, by being driven over the most uneven of roads it is possible to find. The whole terminates in wife finding that she has made a slight mistake. Fortunately the good gentleman and his companion are feling too queer to give vent to their feelings.

WARNER'S FEATURES.

REDEMPTION (Made by Eclair, Paris).—A young working girl, Nana Aumont, lives happily with her father and little sister. One day she is sent by her employer to deliver an order to a wealthy customer and there catches a glimpse of luxury which dazzles her. While waiting in an ante-room, she becomes drowsy and sinks to sleep among the soft cushions on an elegant couch. One of the guests, the Count of Aubiers, comes upon the child and is charmed by her innocent beauty and grace. With soft words he tells her of luxuries and riches which she does not enjoy and finally induces the girl to leave her home and come to live with him. Months pass and Nana has forgotten her people in the whirl of excitement and gayety in which she is engulfed. The Count has become greatly infatuated with the girl and showers her with costly gifts. But her sin finds her out and soon her momentary happiness is changed to sadness.

One day, while delivering a parcel to the house, Nana is confronted by her little sister, who, seeing her finery and guessing from whence it came, rushes from the house to inform her father.

The old man, care and sorrow written on his brow, flies in a rage when told of his daughter's disgrace, and straightway hurries to the home of the Count, where he finds Nana surrounded by hundreds of admirers in the spacious ballroom of the palace.

The old man raises his cane to strike his daughter when he is stricken with apoplexy and dies before Nana's eyes. After this event, the girl falls lower and lower. She becomes fascinated by a handsome café singer, and forsakes the Count when he suffers financial reverses. Then she becomes a dancer and soon grows famous.

At the Moulin Rouge all is excitement. The spacious hall is filled with thousands. "Azyade," the wonderful danseuse is the star feature of the evening. Here is presented with all its beautiful and constantly changing colors the Kaleidoscopic Dance of Inferno, in which Nana, as "Azayade," flits among the flames, apparently, while her costume changes many, many times as though by magic. During the evening, Nana's new-found sweetheart, the handsome singer, finds another girl who attracts him, and he leaves the ballroom with his new acquisition.

Nana, dressed for the street, looks in vain for her escort, while the crowd laughs knowingly at the girl, which adds to her confusion and anger.

An old gentleman approaches her and volunteers his aid and protection. Nana reluctantly accepts, little caring what happens. The friendly old man, however, proves to be a heartless adventurer, who drugs Nana's wine, and, when she falls asleep, robs her of her jewels and money, leaving her friendless and penniless. To add to her discomfiture, she is arrested on complaint of the café proprietor for not paying the bill for the wine, which the old adventurer failed to do.

The magistrate discharges Nana with a rebuke after listening to her story, warning her if she appeared before him again he would surely give her a prison sentence.

Nana sinks lower in life's strata as time wears on. We next find her dancing in a low dive. A band of ruffians precipitate a fight and a riot call is sent to the police. Nana is caught in the raid and is again brought before the magistrate with torn costume and dishevelled hair. This time she is sentenced to prison and is later escorted to a cell where she joins a half hundred other unfortunate women. Here she is subject to sudden fits of anger, culminating in a terrific fight, in which all the inmates join. The Sister Superior of St. Lazare, while visiting the prison, comes upon the belligerents and attempts to separate them. Nana, wild with fury and goaded on by the taunts of her companions, strikes the Sister on the cheek. But here she at last meets her conqueror, for the holy Sister Superior does not strike back, nor does she cry out in pain or rebuke the girl. Kind words, the first she has heard in months, are spoken to the unfortunate wretch. Every syllable burns Nana's ears like hot coals. Ashamed of her conduct, she bursts into tears. She kneels and kisses the hem of the Sister's garment, thoroughly broken. Remorse has entered the heart of the sinner.

Worn out physically and mentally, Nana is stricken with fever and is tenderly removed to the Infirmary of St. Lazare. Here, as the moonbeams stream through the window and rest on her white-robed cot, she fancies she is living her life all over again. In her hallucinations she sees her home, the palace of the count, her first false step, and every subsequent one in her wretched life of shame until she strikes in anger the good Sister Superior. She struggles furiously and is only quieted by "The Angel of the Infirmary," who comes herself to calm the poor unfortunate.

Subsequently Nana becomes well and strong, and her prison sentence over, is able to leave the infirmary. She firmly resolves to redeem her past and asks the Sister Superior to assist her to secure honest employment. The good woman sends her to one of the large hospitals armed with a letter of recommendation to the doctor in charge. Here she becomes a nurse.

Suddenly and without warning, the dread plague breaks out in the city. A man staggers into the hospital and is examined by the doctors who diagnose his case as cholera. The nurses are thrown into a panic and they all retreat in fear, excepting Nana, who bravely volunteers to nurse the patient.

Notwithstanding her terrible experiences while witnessing the awful agony of the unfortunate in his dying moments, she does not falter in her duty, but bravely closes his staring eyes and breathes a prayer for the salvation of his soul.

Thus she goes on lending her efforts to combat the plague, rarely sleeping or eating in her desire to save human lives, until the Sister Superior is stricken. Nana, almost exhausted, will allow no one to nurse the good woman but herself.

Careless of the danger she rarely leaves the pillow of the one whose merciful kindness kept her from moral destruction. She succeeds in saving the life of the Sister, but at the sacrifice of her own. Nana falls victim to the scourge and in her weakened condition cannot withstand the ravages of the dread disease. She dies surrounded by those who loved her, and, just too late, she is decorated by the Cross of the Legion of Honor, which has been conferred upon Nana for her remarkable work during the ravages of the plague.

DURING THE CARNIVALS (April 6).—Mr. Smith and Margot, the girl in his office, arrange to go to a carnival, but Mrs. Smith breaks into their tete-a-tete with an intimation that she has accepted an invitation to spend the carnival evening —with him, of course—at her aunt's house. This upsets his plans, and Margot decides to go alone to the festival. Later, however, she sends a letter to Smith telling him that if he can get to the carnival he will know her by her costume in representation of Carmen. Mrs. Smith happens to see this letter and reads the contents. Hubby determines to go, and tells his wife that business calls. Wifey implores the aid of an actress friend, who plots to bring the erring husband to his senses. She dresses as Carmen, and at the masked ball meets Mr. Smith. He begs to see her home, and she consents, providing that he goes blindfolded. This he agrees to, and is led to a waiting taxi just as his clerk hurries up and enters the vestibule. Smith is led to his own home, and when he tears the bandage off, it is to come face to face with his own wife. At first he is inclined to return to the ball, but realizing the humor of the situation, he remains at home.

RELIANCE.

A TRAGIC EXPERIMENT (Mar. 27).—Hager, an old chemist, has been for years experimenting upon a certain combination of chemicals that he expects to make his fortune with. His elder daughter Jane, disbelieves in any such consummation, but Gertrude, the younger daughter, is enthusiastic that her father will succeed. Gertrude is brought home one afternoon by a rich young promoter, Findlay, after she had sprained her ankle. Jane takes an instant dislike to Findlay, but Gertrude quickly loses her heart to him. He larns of Hager's experiment and becomes greatly interested, much to Jane's dislike. Hager promises to allow Findlay to finance the experiment, and succeeding before he expected, he has Jane phone to him to come to the laboratory at once. Findlay comes and the papers are drawn up. He takes a phial of the precious fluid with him and the other phial is placed in the safe. He is in such a hurry when he departs that Jane's further suspicions are aroused as her father will not tell her what happened between them. Hastening to get to the city Findlay breaks the phial and leaves his packing to rush back to the laboratory to get the other phial. Jane sees him rush through into the laboratory and again becomes suspicious but is called out of the room for the moment. In the laboratory Findlay finds Hager asleep and gets the other phial without disturbing him, leaving a note to the effect that he is leaving town at once, etc. Hager awakes, reads the note and tears it in half, using one half to place beneath some chemicals. Going to the sink he slips and falls, pulling down the draperies, some statuary, and knocking over the chair. Jane comes back into the parlor in time to see Findlay rush out. Later when she goes to see her father, she finds him on the floor, to all appearances dead. Gertrude is called and Jane tells her that she believes that Findlay killed her father, but Gertrude will not believe it, even after Jane finds the half of the note left. As it stands, it is a denunciation of Hager and a threat to kill. Firm now in her belief that Findlay killed her father, she phones the police and a doctor, then rushes off to catch Findlay before he can leave town. She finds him and accuses him, but he does not understand. She sees his revolver and is about to shoot him when the phone rings, telling her the police are coming. They apprehend Findlay and take him back to the Hager home. In the meantime the doctor has been able to bring Hager back to consciousness and he secures the other half of the paper and explains how it all happened and Findlay and Gertrude are offered the old chemist's blessing.

THE FUR SMUGGLERS (Mar. 30).—Ruth Maynard lives happily with her father up in the snowbound woods near the Canadian border. Her father and Steve Phillips are fur smugglers, and have always managed to evade the watchful eyes of the customs officers. Walter Leggett, a young customs officer, vows to discover the smugglers, and through his sweetheart, the school teacher in Maynard's vicinity, decides to get on the trail of Maynard. He plans a ruse whereby he will be taken into Maynard's cabin supposedly very ill. The ruse works far better than he expected, for he manages to win the love of Ruth during his supposedly convalescent period. Steve resents Leggett's intrusion and suspects him. He gives Ruth his revolver for protection and she has no occasion to use it until Leggett leaves, making an appointment to meet her down by the river. Steve sees Leggett with the school teacher and later meets Ruth patiently waiting at the tryst. She won't believe Steve at first, then Leggett not coming, she runs home, where she discovers Leggett searching and finding the hidden furs. Securing the gun she waits for him. He discovers her purpose and wrenches the gun from her, then runs down the trail. The school teacher coming along, sees the whole affair. Leggett stumbles and in falling, shoots himself. When Steve is taxed with the killing through the fact that it was his gun that was used, he realizes that Ruth alone must be the responsible one and so shoulders the blame himself. Ruth and the teacher arrive in time to clear Steve and later she slips from her father's comforting arms to seek those of Steve—and is forgiven.

THE BIRTHDAY PRESENT (April 3).—Jones gives Brown a birthday present he has bought for his wife to keep for him until the morrow, when he will call for it. He is afraid if he takes it home his wife will find it first. Mrs. Brown sees her husband enter with a package and place it in his bureau drawer. Out of curiosity she opens it and finds a beautiful fan with a card reading: "From Darling Tootsie to Dearest Wootsie." Vowing to get even with her husband for having an affinity, she replaces the fan with a cake of soap and sends her husband off in the morning with the package under his arm in great anticipation of his condition when he returns home that night. Jones calls for the package and goes to present his wife with it. Infuriated at the insult, the wife beats him up thoroughly. Jones, thinking that Brown played a trick on him by substituting soap for the fan, goes to Brown's office and beats him up in return. Brown goes home to recuperate and his wife receives him with joy, telling him that hereafter he will let affinities alone. When he explains she is infuriated at the Jones's. Jones goes home and tells his wife that he beat up Brown for the trick, but she will not believe it until she sees Brown, so they repair to Brown's home. When the women meet there is a tornado of argument and Brown gives Jones the wink, whereat the two men repair to sideboard with their backs to the women and drink a toast. The two wives see their action, and in mutual anger at the two men, make up, which results in an all-around forgiveness, return of the present and birthday congratulations.

REPUBLIC.

CURE FOR STAGE FEVER (April 9).—Miss Hastings, a young society lady, has arrived at the conclusion that her forte and aim in life is to become a theatrical star, because somebody wrote a glowing notice of her first appearance in amateur theatricals during college days. Tom Blake, a prosperous stock broker, is in love with Miss Hastings. He has proposed many times but Miss Hastings says she will never marry until she has made a name for herself as the world's greatest actress.

Tom Blake thought the matter over and came to the conclusion to humor her whim. So he calls on Mr. Steinberg, a theatrical man, and they devise a scheme whereby Mr. Blake is willing to become an angel to the extent of handing over a couple of thousand dollars. Steinberg is told to engage Miss Reader Blair, the leading lady to head the aggregation of barnstormers.

We soon get a glimpse of the first rehearsal on the opening night at Stony Brush, New York. The audience is not very enthusiastic over the performance, and they have secured a collection of the vegetables the country store afforded. They don't take the trouble to hand these in at the stage door, but instead, they throw them over the footlights with a vim. The next morning, the country paper does not write a very glowing notice of the attraction. The receipt funds being very small, the manager of the company is compelled to wire to Steinberg for some more funds to move the company. Steinberg consulted Blake, and the reply is—"Impossible to send money, do best you can." The best they could do was to try to pacify the landlord of the hotel, but he being a "wise old owl," keeps the trunks, not only that, but gives them notice to vacate, as the Hop Growers' Convention was to be held the following week and he needed all his rooms.

We get a glimpse of the East Lynne Troupe traveling to New York by rail, taking the permission to walk the tracks of a prominent railroad. The first old woman becomes weary and falls exhausted. Miss Blair, with a sympathetic heart, comes to her succor, while the rest of the troupe are far in the lead. Miss Blair happens to see Farmer Scroggins, and appeals to the kindly old farmer and he takes them to his home, where they are marooned for several days.

Miss Blair, much against her will, is forced to write to her fiance to come and relieve her sad condition. Blake has been expecting this, and in fact is much worried that he had not heard from the East Lynne Troupe sooner. He takes the next train out and arrives at the home of Farmer Scroggins. Miss Blair, with tear-stained eyes, confesses that never again will she appear on any stage, as she has been cured of stage fever.

A TRAGIC MOMENT (April 13).—Clementine Boland and Benjamin Yardley love each other, but Clementine's father objects to the young man marrying his daughter. After the young man is several times ejected from the house by the father, he decides that the only alternative is that he and Clementine elope. While they are planning together the father overhears them and orders his daughter to remain in the house.

Benjamin is persistent; he gets a ladder and by that means gets Clementine out of the house unseen by the father, but they are seen by the gardener, who informs the father. Clementine and Benjamin get in carriage and start for the church. In the meantime the father gets into his auto and follows the elopers. The carriage breaks down, Clementine and Benjamin are forced to run from the father, who arrives on the scene. The father chases after the couple. After a chase Benjamin bribes a farmer to help them out, giving him some money. He tells the farmer to put the old man on the wrong track. The father arrives on the scene and the farmer informs him that the boy and girl are in his house. The father follows him to the house and the farmer gets him to enter his store-room. The father does so and the farmer immediately closes and locks the door, holding the father a prisoner.

The boy and girl run to a church and are married. The father, who has been held a prisoner for three hours, hears loud talking, and, placing his ear to the door, hears the farmer's wife pleading with her husband. The husband in a fierce voice tells her that nothing that she may say will save his life. The farmer takes his knife and sharpens it. The father, terror-stricken, believes that the farmer and his wife intend to kill him for his money. The young couple, believing that they have the laugh on father, through the window see the bloody knife in the farmer's hands, and hearing the wife upbraid him and declare "that he has killed him," the couple come to the conclusion that their papa has been killed and run to the sheriff, informing him of the tragedy.

The sheriff and some farmers go to the farmer's house. They arrive in time to see the farmer come from the house with a shovel and hear him inform his wife that "it is best that he bury him now." The sheriff, on Clementine's and Benjamin's accusation, arrests the farmer, who eventually, after some explanations, takes them behind the barn and shows them his wife's pet pig that was sick, and he was compelled to kill him.

They all go in the house and the father is released from his prison. The young people get the father's blessing, who is thankful that the outcome of the affair was not as tragic as he anticipated.

SOLAX.

THE DETECTIVE'S DOG (April 10).—Kitty, the six-year-old daughter of Detective Harper, finds a homeless dog. Her mother does not look with favor upon the animal, and is about to drive him away when Harper decides that they will keep the dog. A gang of counterfeiters victimize some storekeepers with bad bills. The storekeepers complain to Captain Matthews of the Police Department, and he in turn notifies Detective Harper by telephone.

He traces the gang to their headquarters in the suburbs, and as he is about to enter the house, they discover the detective. The chief enters the house and notifies his accomplices who are at work printing bad money. They plan to capture the detective, and lay a trap for him. He falls into it and they bind him in a basement chamber on a slab with an automatic circular saw attachment.

In the meantime, Mrs. Harper, on the second day of her husband's absence, worries, and the child Kitty suggests that the dog Jack, be sent to search for him. Mrs. Harper is taken with the idea and gives the dog an old coat of the detective's to scent. The dog dashes off to find the detective, locating him finally in the underground chamber, and crawling through a grated window to reach him, gnaws the rope that binds the man. The detective telephones for the police and the criminals are arrested. The dog has proved his gratitude for the kind action, and earns the gratitude of the whole family.

BILLY'S NURSE (April 12).—For three consecutive mornings Billy meets a young nurese. She is very pretty and naturally Billy falls in love with her. He tries to make advances, but she rebuffs him most cruelly. Now Billy is angry. He will win the girl or know the reason why. For a few minutes he ponders, looking a tthe big hospital building. A brilliant thought strikes him. Returning home, he makes his landlady believe he has been taken suddenly ill with appendicitis and writhes in supposed pain. They ring for an ambulance—the one belonging to the hospital he desires. As it drives into the hospital yard, the young nurse happens to be out front.

The moment she sees him, anger and resentment turns to pity. He is placed in her ward and when they are alone, he confesses what he has done. The girl is filled with resentment and she insists that he is a very sick man, although he doesn't know it. Billy grows frightened when she calls a consultation of physicians, who have been tipped off in advance. Solemnly they gather around him. They feel his pulse, examine him, and find that he has appendicitis and must undergo an immediate operation.

Billy is being punished for his trickery. In desperation he wraps his sheets about him and attempts to escape. The nurse discovers this and he is put back in bed. But when the worry of it all actually makes Billy sick, she in turn is frightened and nurses him through his illness, finally confessing her love.

GAUMONT.

JIMMIE CAPITULATES (April 11).—Tiny Jimmie bears all the earmarks of developing into a strong woman-hater when he reaches the age of an adult. In fact he scorns the weaker sex in general, but his sister in particular. To him, little girls seem absolutely valueless and good for nothing. In bravado fashion, Jimmie dons his soldier's uniform, strides his broom-bodied battle steed, unsheaths his pine sword and spreads terror to his little sister and Julie, the nurse, taking advantage of the absence of his mother. But alack! our mighty warrior trips over a humble little rug and bruises his face most rudely upon the kitchen floor. He forgets his bravado and weeps most cowardly. Little sister forgives her brother's contempt for females and ministers his every need while in such pain. This brings Jimmie to his proper senses whereby his views on womankind are entirely altered. In fact they are heaven's blessing in his estimation ever afterward.

A VICTIM OF CIRCUMSTANCES (April 11).—Amorous Algie and persevering Percival are both terribly in love. Algie's fair Imogene has sent him an invitation to dinner, while Percival's Cleopatra has given him the cold shoulder right. So deeply does Percy take to heart his sweetheart's jilting that he decides to commit suicide, and writes his dazzling Cleopatra to that effect. Algie, happening along, goes to mail the mysterious letter, but drops it from his pocket along one of the avenues where the noted Fuddleall, detective incognito, observes its fall, reads it and mistaking Algie for its writer, decides to follow and watch him lest harm occur. Poor Algie certainly is made to suffer for Fuddleall's mistake, even unto losing his own fiancée.

THE PRAIRIE ON FIRE (April 14).—Yellow Feather, the fierce, implacable Indian chieftain of the Ojibway Indians, has just received a wrist wound after an encounter with the government reserve agent over the affairs of his tribe. Although the agent's wife heals the wound, the warrior nourishes a deep-seated grievance. In revenge he sets fire to the prairie surounding the camp of the cowboys, who hurriedly round up their horses and cattle, pack their prairie schooners with their possessions and resort to the marshes for safety. On their way, they encounter the red fiends and kill them all except Yellow Feather, who in his endeavors to escape becomes encircled with the flames of his own kindling and dies a merited death.

REX.

MODERN SLAVES (April 4).—Phil Roberts and his wife were slaves. Phil was cashier for a large mercantile house that encouraged him to be dishonest by paying him twenty-five dollars a week; and it just happened that Phil didn't need much encouragement. Tom Crane, Phil's office associate and residential neighbor, working for the same salary, industrious, thrifty, ambitious, struggling to pay off the mortgage on his little home, working long hours after the others in the office had ceased their toil to earn a little extra money to make more comfortable the lives of the little wife at home and the two kiddies.

Phil Roberts and his wife were slaves; but their ideas were a little out of focus, so their poor aristocratic thoughts told them that they were free, but that the Cranes were slaves. Mrs. Crane did her own housework, Mrs. Crane wore very simple dresses. Mr. Crane never wore evening clothes, Mr. Crane didn't belong to any clubs.

Phil repeatedly invited Tom to his club, and Tom persistently declined; but once he grew tired of refusing Phil's sincere hospitality. He had to hire a dress suit, so the mortgage on the home was post-poted. And he was invited by a man whom he met at the club to atten a little reception he was about to give. "And bring the Mrs. along."

It meant a new gown, but Tom felt he had to maintain his respect among his new acquaintances. So again the possession of his little house was a week farther away.

While at the reception, Phil discovered that he needed a little more money than he had. He excused himself and went to the office, and there he found his employer and an accountant going over his books. He had lied, but the figures didn't and—he realized! Phil was a slave—and slaves are cowards!

So the next morning Tom found Phil's body, with the gun in his hand. And that evening they had a little talk, did Tom and his wife, and they resolved to emancipate themselves from the sinful serfdom that was claiming them, to return to the poverty that was wealth.

THE UNENDING LOVE (April 7).—His love for his invalid wife was strong, strong and tender, tender and tense; but it was a man's love, and there are things more constant. So when he met the little stage girl and she looked into his eyes in that certain way and gave him her hand with that thrilling little tremble—he forgot. He spoke to her and listened to her, and he followed the light in her eyes to the shores of sin.

That night the suffering little wife, stoic in her sorrow, her soul happy in her answered love, noticed the change and her heart grew heavy with the portent of an unknown and unguessed disaster. A few days later he told her told her he loved another. A great cry like a lost wail from desert wastes, rose up; a silent sob was born to mock the false love of man, and the broken heart in the frail frame beat a Requiem, and stopped!

A moment after her eyes closed in death, they opened into a great grandeur and glory . . . But her love for the weak man conquered her happiness, and her spirit brooded.

He married the other and the spirit of the departed one came to them and whispered in the silences, but they neither heard nor heeded. So she returned to the shores of Far-Away, and there it was given to her to master her problem in a manner to earth's children unknown and unknowable.

A few weeks later the husband entered the house to see his wife in the arms of another. He ordered the man to leave, and the weak woman went with him.

Then in the long, lonely hours, th espirit of his first wife would glide into the room and woo him with her wistful whispers, and once he heard the sound, and with a start looked for the voice in the stillness about him, and found only the hunger in his heart. Once also, obeying an impulse suggested by an inexplicable and invisible force, he took her photograph and pressed it to his lips. And again he heard the call, and God permitted him to respond.

His body fell back in the chair, and his spirit crossed the divide. And there, in the land of tomorrow he met her. Gently she took him by the hand and sweet was the smile of her triumph. And as he wandered and wondered, she led him -into the light.

THE GREATEST STATE RIGHTS EVER OFFERED

Every Foot Hits the Bull's Eye—A Perfect Record of a Wonderful Exploration

CAPTAIN SCOTT'S SOUTH POLE EXPEDITION

In Two Reels 2,000 Feet---Exclusively Guaranteed

A complete two-reel reproduction of the Antarctic Expedition of Captain Robert Scott, R.N., from the hour of his departure from his beginning point at Wellington, New Zealand, up to his winter encampment at Cape Evans across the great ice-barrier of the South Frigid Zone, including such genuine and unusual pictures as dodging through icebergs, crunching the heavily clogging ice-floes, making the landing on the great Ice Barrier itself, unloading the Terra Nova, building the Antarctic camp, sleighing, ski-ing, hunting, rounding up and sporting with the penguins, the lonely peaks of Mount Erebus, and the gloomy, menacing Mount Terror, and lastly, the climaxing feature of unusual grandeur and rarity, "THE MIDNIGHT SUN."

THE ONLY REAL FEATURE OUT TODAY!

You can afford to handle this on account of the booking prices it will command. No melodrama or depraved drawn-out three-reeler. The Timeliest Sensation Ever Sprung.

Absolute copyright protection. Nation-wide advertising campaign. Lithos of special design in many sizes. 1-2-3-8-sheets. Heralds, etc.

REMEMBER—Our attorneys are Goldie & Gumm, 27 William Street, New York. They stand prepared to relentlessly prosecute the first infringer. They will go to any extreme to land their man. So will we.

NOTE.—We have acquired the exclusive American privileges to Captain Scott's South Pole Expedition in two reels from the Gaumont Co. Write, wire or 'phone

THINK A LITTLE!

Don't be unreasonable, by asking us why we did not have a miniature screen, or a fraction of a screen

ON EXHIBITION AT DAYTON

If you have given the Concave Shape the least thought, you will know that it would be impossible where we fit the throw — angle — and size of your picture with our

"PERFECTION CONCAVE SCREEN"

as a whole, every inch of the surface carefully calculated, and every one of the eighty pieces used in the construction of the frame adjusted to fit the conditions of the stage for which it is intended.

No tailor will make a suit of clothes with more precision, or more careful measurements than do we when fitting our screen to your picture.

Neither could we give you any more idea of how well we could fit your conditions by showing you a piece of screen than could tailor by showing you a piece of cloth.

Specify your requirements and allow us to tell you how well and and at what price we can take care of your screen troubles.

MIRROROIDE

Open your windows, your doors; let daylight and sunlight stream in. It cannot have any effect on the real daylight screen and curtain. We will guarantee to cut your juice and carbon bill down one-third, besides producing a picture that will prove 90 per cent. brighter and clearer, with a depth that will prove a revelation.

Sixty-day run film on a Mirroroide screen is the equal of twenty-day run on any other screen. Sworn affidavits prove it.

Mirroroide is the only curtain and screen sold under a positive guarantee to last a lifetime. It won't crack, peel or turn black. Haze, eye-strain and glare entirely eliminated. B grade cannot and will not lose or deteriorate picture at an angle or close-up view. Get the Best, the Cheapest, MIRROROIDE.

A large free demonstration sample A and B grades free. We show you test samples with any screen or curtain in your town, city or state. We Bar None

Forty per cent. of Mirroroide orders are repeats; 1,046 screens and curtains in use all over the world. Why? Save money, save troubles, save your peace of mind. Get the World's best

MIRROROIDE

It's up to you. Do it now. At once. Remember Mirroroide is guaranteed.

Notice to Manufacturers of Moving Pictures

At the annual convention of the "National Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees" held in Niagara Falls, N. Y., during July, 1911, a resolution was adopted instructing their executive board to communicate with the manufacturers of moving pictures and respectfully request that members of the I. A. T. S. E. be employed to construct all scenery, scenic effects, properties, etc., and the setting thereof, used in the production of moving pictures.

By the employment of members of the I. A. T. S. E. you are assured of the very highest class of skilled workmanship in all lines of construction. This, in conjunction with the fact that your film is being projected by operators, members of the I. A. T. S. E., should doubly assure its perfection, on completion and exhibition on the screen.

Capable men in all branches will be furnished upon application to our offices or our representative will call at your request.

Respectfully,
Jos. L. Meeker, Cor. Sec.,

SCENARIO WRITERS!

If your scenarios do not sell find out why. Perhaps your manuscript can be rewritten and made saleable, and your mistakes may be corrected in future manuscripts. The author of "Technique of the Photoplay," etc., will give your manuscript personal criticism and revision for a fee of only $2.

REVISION—Scenarios having a reasonable chance of a sale will be edited and revised and a typewritten copy supplied for one dollar per finished page. Send the manuscript and a reading fee of one dollar. If the scenario will not warrant further expense, it will be returned to you; if it does, you will be advised as to full cost. Please note that this covers no criticism.

Exhibitors!

Submit your difficulties to the author of "The Photoplay Theater," and other articles on management, for advice and suggestion, the result of twenty years' experience in amusement enterprises. Simple questions $1 each.

THE WOULD-BE-BRIDE'S RECEPTION

WANTED --- A WIFE

Tom, tired of bachelor life, advertises for a pretty wife and is deluged with hundreds of answers. He selects that of an orphan girl twenty-two years old and arranges to meet her at the station. Other cowboys learning of his secret intent resolve to play a joke on Tom, and on the arrival of the train, smuggle the pretty bride-to-be away and substitute a homely cook. The complications that arise amuse all but Tom, until in a most unexpected manner, he learns the truth. Then he "puts one over" on the boys that turns the joke on them.

EARNING A REPUTATION

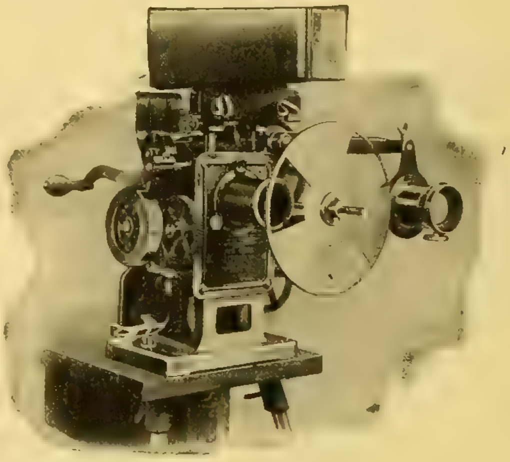
That is what the Nicholas Power Co. has been doing

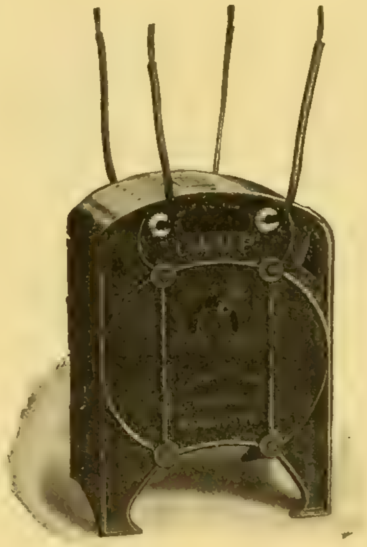
AND KEEPING IT

That is what Power's Cameragraph No. 6 is doing

We are pioneers in the moving picture machine industry. For fourteen years we have been in the game, always blazing the trail for the other fellows.

In "Power's No. 6" the most vital point of all—Perfect Projection—has been developed to the highest degree of efficiency. The result is, absolutely flickerless, steady pictures, entire relief from eye strain and headache, satisfied patrons.





Power's Adjustable Inductor

THE PERFECT ECONOMIZER FOR ALTERNATING CURRENT

For over four years Power's Inductor has met with a steady demand and today over 2000 are in service. During that period no change has been made in its electrical design and none has been necessary for it accomplishes the maximum possible saving in the electric light bills and excels particularly in arc regulation and brilliancy of picture.

2 Kinds of One-Sheets, 1 Three-Sheet from YOUR EXCHANGE
Illustrated Heralds from HENNEGAN & CO., CINCINNATI, O.

RELEASED TUESDAY, APRIL 16

With Kid and Kidlet

THE BABY BRIDE

brings the Thanhouser Kid and the Thanhouser Kidlet together again to give your program another "kid picture" treat like "The Guilty Baby." This is even a richer treat since it is almost all-comedy. Imagine the Kid ELOPING WITH THE KIDLET! THAT'S just what the reel's about!

RELEASED, FRIDAY, APRIL 19

Nothing but Thrills

INTO THE DESERT

is melodrama and thrilling melodrama, but it is a consistent story and the treatment is refined. Our best players do some splendid riding in this reel and one of 'em does a dangerous "fall"—from a galloping horse. In fact, there is naught but excitement from the moment the American girl is captured by the Arabs.

KINGS OF THE JUNGLE AT BAY

1000 FEET

This is one of the most startling, realistic and unique pictures ever conceived and is brimful of dare-devil action. A picture that will grip the audience and hold them spellbound and breathless from start to finish.

A MOTOGRAPHIC MASTERPIECE

The masterful photography of this work was intrusted to no less authority than the well known DAVID GOBBETT, famous as the official cinematographer of the Buffalo Jones Expedition in the wilds of Africa.

A GEM OF MODERN CINEMATOGRAPHY

This picture was undertaken at an enormous expense and depicts how a full grown ferocious African Lion and a man-eating Royal Bengal Tiger, after escaping from their circus cages are actually lassoed and captured by four intrepid cowboys. Owing to the hazardous conditions under which this picture was taken all participants had to be heavily insured against accident or death.

SYNOPSIS

A COUNTRY CIRCUS PARADE,
CROWDS BEFORE THE TENTS, BUYING TICKETS,
LION AND TIGER IN THEIR CAGES,
COWBOYS IN A FRIENDLY GAME,
THE LION AND TIGER HAVE ESCAPED, $1000 REWARD FOR CAPTURE;
THE HUNT IS ON; FOLLOWING THE TRAIL;
LION IS SIGHTED; LASSOING THE KING; CAPTURED.
SMOKING OUT THE TIGER, BRONCHO BILL'S NARROW ESCAPE FROM DEATH; THE TIGER AT BAY; CAPTURED.

EVERY EXHIBITOR

Draw any reel out of the Champion prize bag and you'll find a film of quality. We don't ask that you rely on mere talk, but we do ask that you get a Champion and see the truth of our statements. Read over the following:

"WINONA"

An Indian story as sweet as Hiawatha, with a plot peculiar for its fascination and truth to nature. Situations that thrill and surprise at every turn. PECULIAR because it is not like the average Indian story. FASCINATING because of the charm that clings to the life of the Redman.

Released, Monday, April 22nd

"BROTHERS"

A touch of human nature that makes the whole world kin. A story of a Priest and a Burglar. The incense of the altar and the sanctity of worship on the one hand; the dissoluteness and debaucheries of life on the other. THE HOUSE OF GOD is invaded by a burglar, who seeks refuge there from the law. He later atones for his sins at the altar. His saviour, the priest, at the final moment proves to be his own brother.

MR. EXHIBITOR!

Do You Own Your Theatre?

If you do, it's your privilege to protect your investment by selecting a program of the best pictures produced.

If you do, you will obtain TWO MAJESTICS each week, because there are none better made.

If you don't, you are taking any old pictures your Exchange wishes to give you.

Assert your independence, Mr. Exhibitor!

Mr. Exchange Man!

If you buy two Majestics each week we will sell them to you direct at 9 cents a foot and promise faithfully not to deprive you of the privilege of paying 10 cents a foot for any other brands you may wish to buy from any other source.

If you buy only one Majestic each week, the price will be 10 cents a foot.

Our handsome, artistic posters, made by a special artist of the Morgan Lithograph Co., at 5 cents each, which is considerably less than they cost.

TWO SPLENDID MAJESTICS

Sunday, April 14th—"THE RETURN OF LIFE," showing that "One-half the world does not know how the other half lives"—a strong vein of human interest.

Thursday, April 16th—"NOT ON THE PROGRAMME"—a novel, startling and natural denouement marks the climax of this excellent picture—amateur theatricals develop into realism.

Sunday, April 21st—"DOWN AND OUT."
Tuesday, April 23rd—"THE INSTALLMENT PLAN."

Please wire your orders immediately and secure these splendid pictures.

It's all you need, Steves, any place—any time. REPS draw for your good days and your bad.

Released, Tuesday, April 16th

"Los Anarquistas"

The "green-eyed monster" knows no reasoning. Through its blind fierceness, jealousy, unfounded though it is, makes the poor deluded husband in this most unusual picture a willing instrument of a band of anarchists—bent upon the destruction of the President of their South American republic. The intervention of the clever secret service men at the crucial moment—the flight and capture of the bomb thrower—his wife's assistance in the capture of the "gang," and the introduction of a charming romance in this most satisfying story will hold your interest to the last inch of the picture film.

Released, Saturday, April 20th

"A Severe Lesson"

"A secret past makes an uneasy future more often than not." If the young bride in the story had confessed to her elderly groom a former love affair, all might have gone well. Her stepdaughter, already antagonistic, is only too willing to play the detective accompanied by her fiancé, an officer at her father's post. She follows the army Colonel's wife to a meeting with a young cavalry officer. When everything is explained she freely forgives her new mother, and all trouble is soon forgotten in the "dance at the wedding of the Amateur Detective."

TRADE MARK NEW YORK PARIS E ECLAIR FILMS

¶ Few manufacturers draw attention to their mechanical methods. Few dare do it. ECLAIR specializes on it, however.

¶ Most manufacturers rhapsodize about their pictures, but carefully keep 'mum" on the subject of developing and printing. This is because they are get-rich-quick producers. They believe that the films will only be used a few times in each theatre—that a few wabbles, spots, breaks and other faults will not be noticed by the managers whom they haughtily regard as "boobs." These manufacturers begrudge every penny spent in mechanical perfection of their factories, because they know that they can not last long in the business.

¶ ECLAIR films are made on the permanent plan. We know that exhibitors are not "boobs" and that audiences remember names and trade marks!

¶ ECLAIR films are their own best advertisements!

HIS LITTLE SISTER

Hans, who runs the Red Dog Delmonico at the Gulch, tells the boys that his little sister is coming to the camp. They all primp up to receive her, but to their utmost disgust she turns out to be an old crone of 45 years. None of them will have her, but a man is to be lynched. The miners don't think lynching is good enough and they make the victim marry the little sister.

BECKY GETS A HUSBAND

This is a terrible tangle of mixing a Jewish family with an Irish family. Becky Cohen and Pat Casey, next door neighbors, start flirting and then fall in love. The parents on both sides put up an opposition, which is finally overruled. But at the wedding the two factions fall out and there is a rough house, which is finally quieted down by the fire department turning the hose on the party.

CALIFORNIA OSTRICH, PIGEON AND ALLIGATOR FARM

A wonderfully interesting picture of an extensive institution in lower California. The giant birds appear to enjoy civilization. Even to carrying people on their backs. The beauty pigeons rise in clouds and return to their home and keepers, thousands of little alligators scramble over one another in the ponds, while the big fellows show fight to the keepers, who laugh at their wicked attempts to bite.

IN AFTER YEARS

John Wilson's wife being tired of the simple life and having money of her own, leaves her home for the great city. At the same time Marion, the little girl, wanders away and is lost. Jim Connors, a newsboy, finds the child and takes her in. Jim and his mother care for the little one and she grows up to be a beautiful girl. Jim opens a fine drugstore and is about to marry Marion when John Wilson, much broken down, goes into Jim's store and recognizes his child. Connors and Wilson become partners.

MONDAY, APRIL 8th

Nothing like an old time minstrel show to draw the crowds. This is it. The jokes are all laughs, but the biggest is where the boy puts ink in the burnt cork; it won't wash off.

"PUSHOMOBILE RACES."—This is going some. Push it along. It's a novel pastime on the Pacific Coast. Florence E. Turner, the Vitagraph Girl, is in these races and she hasn't lost any of her smile or her old time vigor.

"AT SCROGGINSES' CORNER" TUESDAY, APRIL 9th

This is where they all gather 'round. "Si" Bunny, the general storekeeper, is the interesting central figure in a rural drama of sympathetic heart interest.

"HIS FATHER'S SON" WEDNESDAY, APRIL 10th

Comes back with the money and regains the lost confidence of his father. Proves himself in every way worthy of his sweetheart's love and everybody is proud of him.

"The Jocular Winds of Fate" FRIDAY, APRIL 12th

A jolly good blow that carries an impecunious lord, a good sort, right into the arms of a pretty little heiress. She doesn't know he is a lord and he doesn't know she is an heiress until they are engaged.

"Captain Jenks' Diplomacy" SATURDAY, APRIL 13th

Turns the trick and reconciles everybody. A young son is set right with his grouchy father. The Captain does it with his usual good tact and judgment. Clever piece of work.

In Memoriam

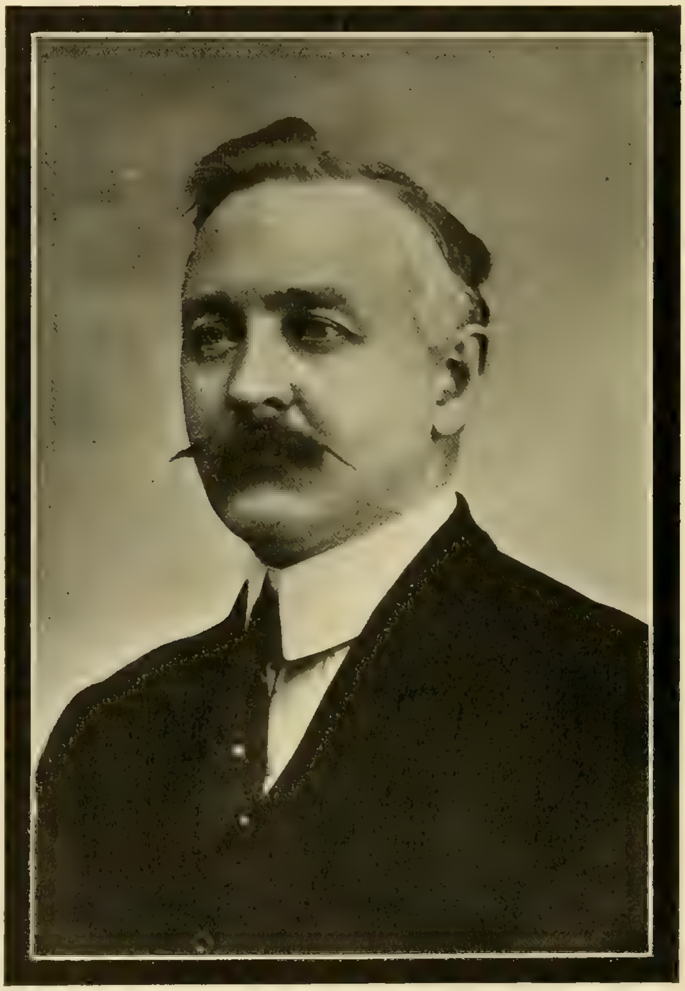
By W. Stephen Bush

THE life-work of James P. Chalmers will form the most important chapter in the history of the motion picture. In the coming development of this invention as an art and as an educational force great men, no doubt, will lend their aid and influence and win renown, but every one of them will build upon foundations laid by Chalmers, and all will be glad to acknowledge the debt and eager to bestow on him the tribute due to the pioneer.

A Retrospect

To get the proper perspective for measuring the value of his services we must briefly sketch the early history of the motion picture and its conditions and environments. When the movable type was invented there was no danger that this momentous discovery would fall into incompetent or questionable hands. It was from the very beginning controlled by the learned classes: by the men who possessed knowledge and power and realized their responsibilities. In the four and a half centuries intervening between the two great inventions radical changes had taken place in the world. Power and authority had passed from the classes to the masses and in the country, where the motion picture had its birth, the only and ultimate source of power was public opinion.

Now it cannot be denied that in the beginning many inferior elements crowded into this business; that the appeal was often to the morbid and the vulgar and that some men made, and others exhibited, pictures which catered to the lowest instincts of humanity. A lurid portrayal of contemporaneous sensational crimes was by no means uncommon. The few men who even then saw beyond the folly and disgrace of the passing hour felt that the future of the invention must largely be determined by the character of its journalistic representation. If the journalistic spokesman of the industry had been indifferent to the future of the motion picture, satisfied with the fleeting gains of the day, if he had been careless or perhaps ignorant of his higher responsibilities, the motion picture, even at this time, might still be a hissing and a by-word. If he allowed the edge of honest criticism to be blunted by the fear of offending powerful interests in any branch of the industry this generation would never have heard of the higher destiny of the motion picture. It would still be half fad and half toy, abandoned by the intelligent and educated to the lovers of dime-novels and the cheapest form of the melodrama.



THE LATE JAMES P. CHALMERS.

Editor's Personality Important

It will be plainly seen, then, that the personality of the journalistic leader of the motion picture was a matter of the utmost importance. The future historian of the motion picture will thank us for a full account of this personality. From the very first Chalmers saw with astonishing clearness the value of the motion picture as a moral and educational agent. Long before an enlightened commercial policy had united various groups of manufacturers in an effort to improve and maintain the quality of the motion picture, Chalmers had mounted guard in his journalistic watch-tower. It was a post of the utmost importance to the development and prosperity of the motion picture. As events quickly proved he was richly endowed with the very qualities demanded by the situation. It may be said in passing that his Scotch ancestry was a valuable asset to begin with. At all times in their national history the Scotch have united an ability to manage the ordinary affairs of life with a strong spiritual bent of mind. Chalmers possessed this strain in a marked degree. In its practical effect this precious quality was much like a filter; it automatically rejected everything low or vulgar. It accomplished, however, far more than mere elimination of unfitness. It gravitated with the certainty of eternal laws toward all that was noble, lofty, uplifting and beneficial to mankind. It scorned "the middle flight" and ever delighted in its search after the best and the highest.

The first dogma then in his creed was quality. From the beginning of his connection with the motion picture to his last conscious utterances Chalmers strove for quality and preached quality. He had no taste for the "politics" of the motion picture. Intrigue and any kind of litigation were wholly foreign to his nature. In the midst of a fierce partisan strife now happily somewhat abated he preserved a calm neutrality and never for one instant changed his motto and watchword, "Quality." Even when the confusion following in the wake of strife brought or threatened to bring financial losses he judged the quality of the pictures entirely on their merit, irrespective of the blasts and counterblasts in the advertising columns. His attitude then impressed every element in the industry with his absolute sincerity.

Steady Growth of Power and Influence

No manufacturer and no exhibitor could have wielded the influence which in the last five years came to be his.

Every branch of the industry felt it more or less. Such power could, in our modern civilization, be exerted by no other agency than the press. The influence of Chalmers and THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD began in 1907 at the most critical period in the history of the motion picture. It has grown in volume every month in the five years of his management. These years, formative in their character, determined the ultimate trend of the moving picture toward the higher aims and the higher destiny. In the course of these years Chalmers drew to himself every true friend of the cinematographic art. He knew how to kindle loyalty and enthusiasm in others. The utter unselfishness of the man, his manifest single-mindedness and sincerity, his ever present and ever active regard for the conditions and feelings of others, his tact, his delicacy, his abhorrence of praise endeared him to all who came in contact with him and constantly widened the sphere of his usefulness. The very fact that prominence of any kind was distasteful to him; that he rejoiced to describe himself as a mere private in the ranks, served to exalt him in the esteem of every moving picture man in the country.

BROAD-MINDED, TOLERANT AND CONSTRUCTIVE

He was broad-minded enough to give his sympathetic interest to every department of the industry. He was by nature tolerant, patient, discriminating and constructive. He had a remarkable eye for the detection of merit. Wherever he found merit he encouraged it and he was a pastmaster in that finest of human arts—the encouragement of others. The influence of a man endowed with such rare qualities, blending harmoniously in the accomplishment of a great task would have been felt anywhere and at any time; but in the peculiar position which he and his paper occupied it was all pervading. No man took a more comprehensive view of things in moving picture land and no man was more familiar with actual conditions. He knew how to count the pulse-beats of the industry; his vision swept every field. He could talk interestingly and intelligently with the humble builder of scenarios; he was at perfect ease in discussing things with the producers, gave a sympathetic ear to the exhibitor and directed the policies and often the details of his great journal. Within the limits of the moving picture industry he was all things to all men. Here his judgment was unerring. He never struck a false note. He was somewhat reticent and reserved and in the course of a friendship lasting many years I have never heard him speak much of himself. That he possessed great reserve powers was very plain to all to whom on extremely rare occasions he revealed his deep grasp of things, his keen perception, his passionate love of his profession, his lofty conception of its duties and his heroic willingness to make sacrifices for the motion picture industry.

HIS PROFESSIONAL ETHICS OLD FASHIONED

He surely had old-fashioned notions of the responsibilities of an editor. He was the antithesis of the sensation monger. Time and again he carried with him the knowledge of great coming events, but refused to print a line because the knowledge had come to him from private sources with an implied expectation that it would be treated confidentially. With all his mildness and urbanity I think he would have rebuked sowers of scandal and spreaders of gossip had they ever dared to approach him. Somehow I think they knew better by looking at Chalmers a second time. Insisting on clean pictures, he gave the example of a clean paper. He did not believe in controversy.

He was generous and forgiving always. He invariably remembered and richly repaid any favor or consideration shown to him; but for slights or injuries he had the poorest kind of a memory. It was this side of his character which enabled him to render such signal services to the industry. Had he been a "fighting editor," the industry would have suffered from the blight of factionalism; as it was, his talents were given to the entire industry and not to any single group of men or interests. To an active journalist this quality of peace-making and harmonizing seems as rare as it is precious in an editor, for, as a rule, editors are bound to make enemies. It is an axiom of politics that no editor can be elected to office. There are too many voters waiting for the opening of the polls and their chance "to get even."

THE EXHIBITOR'S STAUNCHEST FRIEND

In an especial manner was Chalmers the friend of the exhibitor. It was one of the ambitions of his life to be useful to the man on the firing line. He died while personally discharging a duty toward the organized exhibitors. He might have delegated this duty to a member of his staff. He had arranged with the Chicago representative of the paper to come to Dayton and report the doings of the convention of Ohio exhibitors. He knew that an old friend of the paper was on the ground. He felt, however, that the occasion demanded his personal presence, because the interests of the exhibitors were concerned. I cannot imagine any better proof of his attachment to the cause of the exhibitor. This solicitude of Chalmers for the exhibitor was a habit with him. In his mail, in his daily round of duties the exhibitor's welfare always had a preferred place upon his calendar. Letters of inquiry from exhibitors always received his immediate and personal attention. Any exhibitor visiting New York became his guest by calling at the office of the paper. Exhibitors long ago realized and appreciated his friendship and his devotion to their interests. Looking through the files of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD from its first issue to its last we will find frequent appeals to exhibitors to avail themselves of the columns of the paper for either their own benefit or the good of the industry. The texts of many of his editorials were furnished by communications from exhibitors. Chalmers invited the readers of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD to criticise the paper and constantly asked for suggestions from exhibitors. Knowing how important it is for the exhibitor to have the lists of the weekly releases arranged for ready reference he gave this detail of the management long and careful attention. Cautious and conservative, he never hesitated to introduce new features whenever in his judgment or in the judgment of trusted friends they promised to be of practical use to the exhibitor. He was one of the first to see the necessity of exhibitors' associations and he consistently advocated organization of exhibitors. He attended the first national convention of the organized exhibitors in person and took a lively interest in all its proceedings. He outlined in a practical manner the scope and the possibilities of a national organization. "The exhibitor," he wrote at the time, "bears the heat and burden of the day. He is entitled to greater representation in the councils of the industry and hereafter his voice must be heard and his rights recognized."

"What kind of man is Chalmers?" asked an old Philadelphia exhibitor at an exhibitors' meeting in that city some years ago.

"Oh," was the reply of the secretary, "just a plain body like you and I."

Such incidents pleased him greatly. Nothing delighted him more than the expressions of confidence and appreciation from exhibitors, whether such expressions came from individuals or organizations. "This paper is printed for the benefit of the exhibitor," was one of his most frequent utterances to members of his staff. For the protection of his readers he exercised a scrupulous care in sifting advertisements in his paper. A just complaint against a misleading advertisement resulted in its immediate withdrawal and in most cases the complaint was printed as a warning to the readers.

A Journalistic Pathfinder

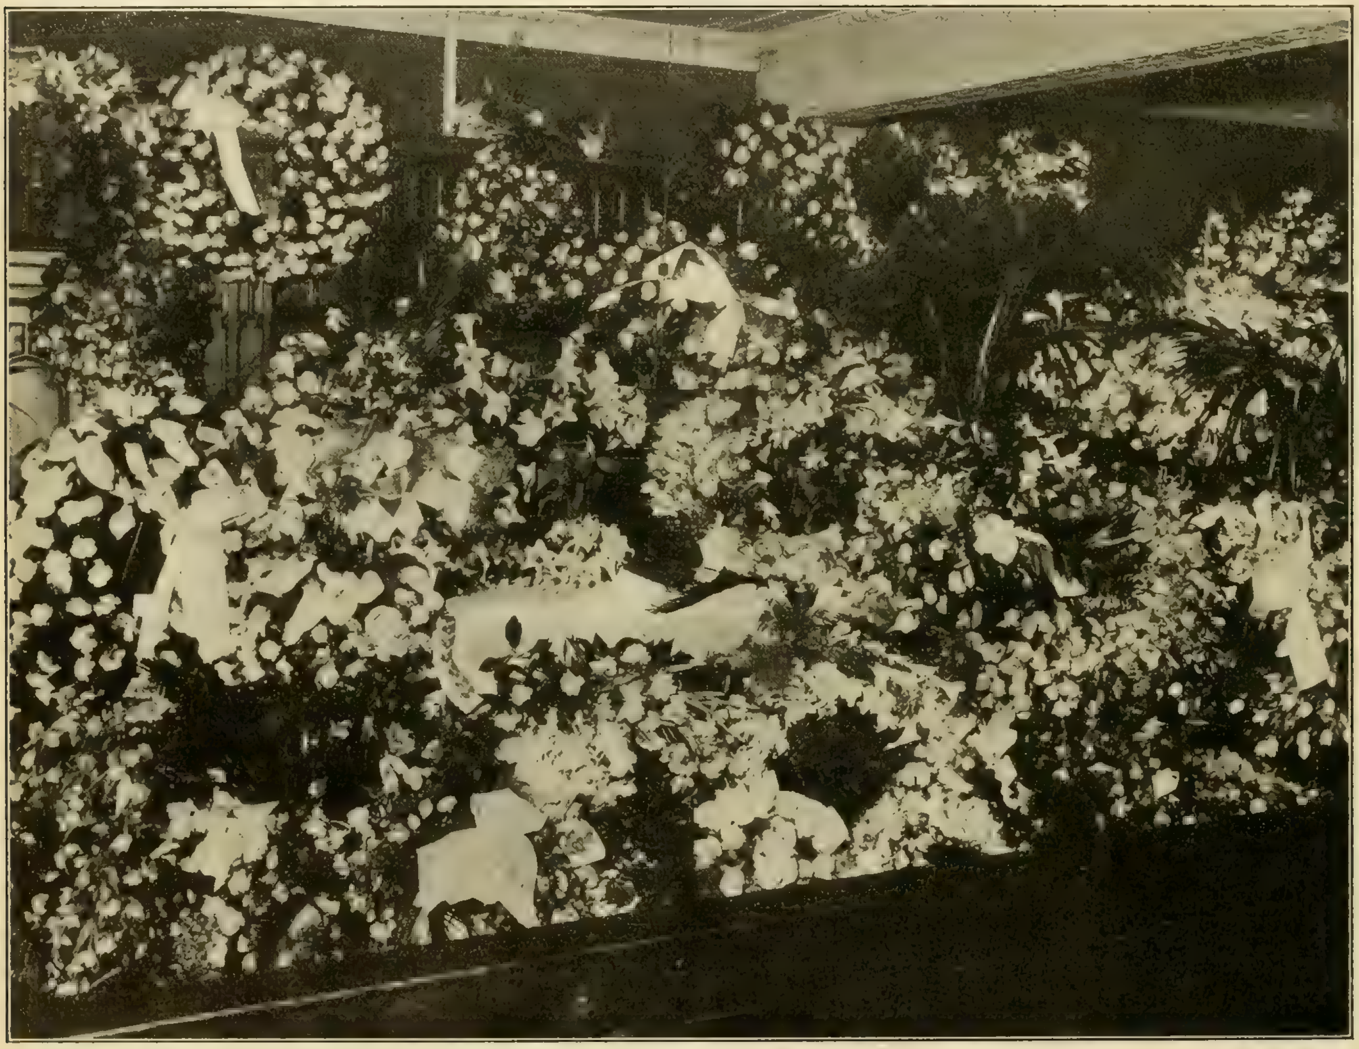
It is impossible to do full justice to Chalmers within the contracted limits of a hasty newspaper article. I have attempted nothing more than to point out, that he was the great journalistic pathfinder of the industry. One thing, however, must be said in conclusion. By the survival of his spirit among us his usefulness is lengthened out far beyond the close of his natural life. The Moving Picture World will always be guided by the policies of Chalmers and it will never for an instant forget his great ideals.

IMPRESSIVE OBSEQUIES.

Funeral services over the remains of the late Mr. James P. Chalmers, editor of the Moving Picture World, were held at the chapel of the F. E. Campbell Undertaking Establishment, 241 West 23rd Street, New York, at 2:30 o'clock Sunday afternoon, March 31, and at Kensico Cemetery, where burial was made on the following Monday. The Sunday services were conducted by the Rev. George Alexander, D. D., pastor of the University Place Presbyterian Church. More than two hundred relatives and friends of the deceased were present. The services were most impressive, and all present were deeply affected by the tribute to the memory of the departed.

On Monday morning, the remains, accompanied by the immediate family and members of the staff of the Moving Picture World, were taken to Kensico Cemetery. Rev. W. H. Jackson, of the staff, conducted the services at the grave, paying a fitting tribute to the high character of the deceased in behalf of his associates.

A representative of the Pathe Weekly was present and took motion pictures of the cortege as it left the Kensico station.



BEAUTIFUL FLORAL TRIBUTE.

Probably nothing more truly reflected the esteem in which Mr. James P. Chalmers was held by the trade and by his friends than the beautiful tribute of flowers pictured here. The donors were: J. F. Post, Jr., Louise M. Marion, William D. Harper, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Blache, Robert Wylie, Miss Shea and Margaret O'Dowd, Milton J. Rosenberg, Ingvald C. Oes, Mr. and Mrs. Russell, Mr. F. T. Montgomery, Mr. M. A. Neff, president of the Exhibitors' League; William Wright, Mr. C. Spencer, Sydney, Australia; Arthur G. Whyte, Mr. and Mrs. Archer and Edward Archer, W. J. Watkins, Majestic Moving Picture Company, Exhibitors' League of Ohio, American Film Manufacturing Company, Carlton Motion Picture Company, Empire Film Company, Great Eastern Film Company, Peerless Film Company, Metropolitan Film Company, Carey Printing Company, Vitagraph Company, Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York, Essanay Film Company, Republic Film Company, Kalem Company, Nicholas Power Co., Motion Picture Distributing & Sales Company, Great Northern Special Feature Film Company, New York Poster and Sign Company, Employees of the H. TRIBUTES FROM FRIENDS.

News of the death of Mr. James P. Chalmers brought forth many expressions of sympathy and condolence from friends and members of the motion picture trade. From them we glean the following:

Moving Picture World, New York:
I have just been informed of Mr. Chalmers' death by accident and extend to you and his family my sincere sympathy and condolence. The moving picture art and industry lose in him an able and energetic protagonist.—George Kleine, Chicago, Ill.

Moving Picture World, New York City:
Please convey my sympathy to family and friends of Mr. Chalmers. No death could have caused more serious regret than did this sad accident. Please accept floral tribute.—F. Montgomery, Dayton, O.

Moving Picture World, New York:
Sincerest condolence over sad accident to my friend Chalmers.—J. E. Brulatour, New York.

Moving Picture World, New York:
Words cannot express my sorrow at this terrible news. Kindly offer my condolence to the family. Will do my best here.—G. P. Von Harleman, Chicago, Ill.

Moving Picture World, New York:
We are all profoundly shocked to learn of the fatal accident to Mr. Chalmers. Accept our most sincere sympathy. Eugene V. Brewester, Editor Motion Picture Story Magazine.

Moving Picture World, New York City:
Just heard sad news. Accept our heartfelt sympathy in loss of your esteemed editor.—Edwin J. Ryan, Managing Editor of Photoplay Pub. Co., Chicago, Ill.

Moving Picture World, New York City:
The news of Mr. Chalmers' death came as a great shock to us. It is a calamity that we mourn in common with the entire moving picture world. Our deepest sympathy is yours.—W. R. Rothacker, Manager Industrial Moving Picture Co., Chicago, Ill.

Moving Picture World, New York City:
We extend our heartfelt sympathy to his relations on his untimely death. We also express our sorrow with the motion picture world at his sad ending.—M. A. Neff, President M. P. Exhibitors' League of America.

Moving Picture World, New York:
Accept my most sincere expression of sympathy. The bereavement is widespread as befits the useful life of the man.—Carl Laemmle, New York.

Moving Picture World, New York:
Have just learned of the sad and untimely death of Mr. Chalmers, a warm and personal friend of mine. Kindly accept my hearfelt sympathy, also extending same to his family and associates. I consider him a personal loss.—Bernard M. Corbett, Kinetograph Sales Dept. Thomas A. Edison, Inc.

Moving Picture World, New York:
I join with picturedom in mourning the loss of a faithful chronologist, a wise guide, a staunch friend. His quiet, unassuming strength will live and build his printed monument.—Leon J. Rubinstein, New York.

Moving Picture World, New York City:
I am very much shocked to hear of the death of Mr. Chalmers and wish to extend my kindest expressions of sympathy to his family and desire to express my regret that the destiny of your paper must now pass from the hands of a man who has so ably and conscientiously shaped it heretofore.—Dwight Macdonald, New York.

Moving Picture World, New York City:
It was with deep regret that I learned of the untimely death of Mr. James P. Chalmers, editor and publisher of the Moving Picture World. The moving picture industry will do well if it can find one of equal ability to take Mr. Chalmers' place as editor and publisher of the Moving Picture World.—L. C. M'Chesney, of Thos. A. Edison, Inc.

Moving Picture World, New York City:
I desire to express to the Moving Picrure World my great regret at the sad news you send me about my friend Mr. Chalmers. I have known Mr. Chalmers for a good many years. The news was a great shock to me, and I am deeply grieved that he has passed away.—C. H. Claudy, Washington, D. C.

Moving Picture World, New York:
It was with profound sorrow and regret that I learned of the untimely death of your editor, Mr. J. P. Chalmers. I had known Mr. Chalmers for a long time, and in my business relations with him, I have found him to be thoroughly conscientious and trustworthy and always endeavoring to advance the motion picture industry, and his loss will be keenly felt by all who came in contact with him. Permit me to extend to you all my heartfelt sympathy.—S. Lubin, Philadelphia, Pa.

Moving Picture World, New York:
Accept my deep regret for the great loss which has come to you in the passing away of Mr. J. P. Chalmers. Only those who had the opportunity of knowing him and his loyal nature can fully realize what this loss means to you.—Charles Kraus, New York.

Moving Picture World, New York:
It is with sorrow and regret that I read the announcement of the death of your Mr. James Petrie Chalmers, for whom I always held the highest regard. With sadness I am writing this letter of sympathy, for he was one that always had a kind word for every one that he came in contact with.—G. B. Graff, Quaker City Film Exchange, Philadelphia, Pa.

Moving Picture World, New York:
It is with most sincere sorrow that I learn of your misfortune. In the passing of J. P. Chalmers I have lost a warm personal friend and supporter. In J. P. Chalmers the industry has lost one of its greatest figures—one who battled steadily for what was right and one who ever wielded his strength where the cause of motion pictures might be benefited. His loss will be generally mourned and his memory will linger long in the minds of those who have at heart the betterment of this business.— S. S. Hutchinson, Pres. American Film Mfg. Co., Chicago, Ills.

Moving Picture World, New York City:
We are inexpressibly shocked and grieved to hear of the untimely and tragic death of the man whom we counted our friend these many years. Mere words are inadequate to express the regret we feel at the loss of Mr. Chalmers, whom we held in highest esteem. The passing of this man will be keenly felt in every branch of the motion picture industry, and we beg you to extend to his relatives and associates our deepest sympathy.—Pathé Frères, per J. A. Berst, Vice-Pres.

Moving Picture World, New York City:
In this dark hour of bereavement we extend our deepest sympathy and heartfelt condolence in your sorrow. For the friends we have loved and lost we mourn and grieve, but we are thankful to Him who gives and takes that the memory he leaves behind is an unblemished and inspiring record of humane effort and human achievement; a memory that is a monument to the strivings and aspirings of all mankind; a memory that will be revered through all the years of to-morrow. He fought the good fight, he attempted and achieved, he aspired and attained.—Rex Motion Picture Co., Jos. W. Engel, Secy., New York.

The Moving Picture World, New York, N. Y.:
It is with profound sorrow that we learn of the death of Mr. J. P. Chalmers. The moving picture business has lost its staunchest supporter and the strongest exponent for the uplift of the industry; his intimates mourn a faithful friend and the literary world a forceful writer. The members of the New York Motion Picture Co. deplore the loss of a man sterling in integrity, aggressive in the carrying out of his lofty ideals, and who had the sincere welfare of the moving picture business at heart.—A. Kessel, Jr., and Chas. O. Baumann, New York.

Moving Picture World, New York City:
I have just read the account of the tragic death of Mr. J. P. Chalmers. Others can estimate the greatness of his loss to the Moving Picture World, both magazine and industry, better than I can; but I cannot refrain from expressing my sympathv with you, in the loss of one of the fairest, squarest and most courteous men with whom it has been my lot to have dealings.—(Rev.) E. Boudinot Stockton, 167 North Parkway, East Orange, N. J.

Notice to Our Readers and Friends.

By unanimous consent of the family and upon petition of James Petrie Chalmers, Sr., the father of the late James P. Chalmers, editor, owner and founder of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD, the Surrogate's Court of New York County has issued joint letters of administration to Miss Eliza J. Chalmers, a sister of the deceased editor, and Mr. John Wylie, a cousin, who has been closely associated with the late Mr. Chalmers in the management of the paper for several years. The paper will remain in complete control of the family of the late Mr. Chalmers, whose policies will be followed in both the business and editorial management.

A NEW ART.

The wonderful development of moving pictures in the last few years has brought along with it a new art, a demand for musical accompaniment such that will express the sentiment of the picture. The musician who can properly depict through his music the scenes and climaxes of the modern moving picture, may well be proud to call himself an interpreter of fotoplay.

My work as a pianist in some of the largest houses in the East and West has made me at home with the scenes on the screen, and I might be of help to the ambitious musician who wants to gather what he can on the subject.

The secret for the successful man lies in three points: A smooth modulation from one theme to another quickly; a command of memorizing many classical numbers, and most of the popular music of the day, the hits in the musical productions and popular songs, and the gift of improvising on the various melodies by reaching climaxes as the picture demands.

One with the knowledge of harmony will have the advantage in this respect. The introduction of one melody at various times through the picture is commendable in various forms or by an abrupt change of key, but not too often to make it monotonous.

The musician will understand that the careful handling of the diminished seventh chord will produce many dramatic effects and give him a chance for modulation into another key.

One of the obstacles to be overcome to-day is the long hours inflicted on the pianists by managers, which in itself is apt to take the ambition out of a man who wants to do his best. If the pianist can make the manager see—through the voice of his audience—the value of his music (by my own experience), I think he can make his work less laborious.

In the house where I am at present, the manager sees this, and the music being a feature, I rest every fourth reel, keeping me in shape for the last part of the evening, and I feel that I enter into the music with as much vim as the first half, and the audience likes the occasional rest and welcomes the return to the piano.

If more musicians would see "Playing the Pictures" in the right light there would be (at least in the West), fewer electric pianos and circus methods and more of a fascination for the Fotoplay.

The Passing of James P. Chalmers.

An Account of the Accident and of Mr. Chalmers' Last Moments Before It, from Carefully Sifted Data.

By James S. McQuade.

THERE were so many rumors and conjectures current in Dayton regarding the lamentable accident which led to the untimely death of James P. Chalmers, owner and editor of The Moving Picture World; and, besides, there are so many thousands of readers of this publication who are desirous of having the plain facts brought before them that I write this article from well-sifted data.

Judging from a telegram received by me in Chicago, late Monday afternoon, March 25, and sent from the Erie station in Jersey City by Mr. Chalmers, I did not expect to meet him in Dayton, to which city the telegram instructed me to proceed and cover the Ohio convention. This telegram impressed me that he had changed his mind and that he was not coming.

Shortly after two o'clock Tuesday afternoon, in Dayton, while marching in the grand parade from the Customs House to the Postoffice, of which moving pictures were being taken by Pathe Freres and Gaumont, I chanced to look around towards the right, at a certain point, and was surprised to see Mr. Chalmers on the crowded sidewalk. Not wishing to break line while in the camera's field, I drew his attention by shouting his name and waving a flag, and joined him soon afterwards.

WELCOMES

Group of "Snap Shots" Found in Mr. Chalmers' Kodak After the Accident. Developed by John M. Bradlet.

The street cars which had been promised to convey the delegates from the termination of the line of march to the National Cash Register Company's Industrial and Educational Hall were not on hand, and, after waiting for some time and fearing that we would be late in arriving at the Hall and miss some of the proceedings of the meeting, R. R. Nehls, of the American, sent in a call for a taxi to take our little party out. As the taxi was long in coming and the expected cars arrived, Mr. Chalmers suggested that I should board one of them with him, which I did.

This was the last opportunity I had to talk with him, and during the ten minutes' drive we conversed on the outlook for exhibitors and on the splendid turnout at Dayton. He impressed me as being anxious that the National Exhibitors' League of America should be guided by wise forethought and far-seeing vision in their deliberations and adopted policies, steering clear of political entanglements and having ever in view the welfare of the majority. I remember, too, that he dwelt on the importance of wise leadership—leadership that recognized the rights of manufacturers and exchanges as well as the rights of exhibitors, and that aimed at the uplift of the whole moving picture industry.

In front of the N. C. R. hall, where the delegates and visitors were assembled to have still and moving pictures taken of them, I was separated from Mr. Chalmers and never again had a chance to speak to him, as, on entering the hall, I walked down in front to the press table near the platform. When last I saw him he was standing in the front row near the right end of the semi-circle formed by the delegates and visitors, with hat in one hand and his camera in the other, looking smilingly at Ralph Rodney Earle, who was taking a panoramic picture of the group for Pathe's Weekly. If I mistake not, he took a snapshot of Mr. Earle about the same time that he himself came into the field of Earle's instrument. At any rate a good picture of him will be seen in that part of the Pathe film taken at Dayton.

And now, alas! the continuation of this narrative centers on the fateful spot where he stepped from full intellectual and physical vigor into unconsciousness and the tomb. It seems so bitter that, after the hard, upward struggle, just when life's untiring labor was being rewarded with a promising harvest, the grim reaper should approach with relentless sweep. And it seems so fatefully strange that this kind, warmhearted man, whose good deeds brightened the lives of so many of his fellows, should have been denied one lucid moment to say farewell. It was hoped that he might, before the final moment of dissolution; and so his old friend John M. Bradlet, who attended the convention, was on hand, at the Miami hospital, for one hour before his death.

Mr. Chalmers must have sat in the convention hall while the speeches of President Neff, Mayor Phillips and Mr. Deeds, vice-president of the N. C. R. Co., were being delivered. About this time I observed that the machine operators were focusing their pictures on the two large glass screens, set about midheight in the rear wall, at the platform end of the hall. The pictures are projected from behind the screens, the operating room being in the rear of the convention hall.

Though I could find no one—nor could Mr. Bradlet find anyone—who observed Mr. Chalmers leave the convention hall, there is no doubt that he, being very deeply interested in projection and, perhaps, unfamiliar with transparent glass screens, was most anxious to get into the operating room. He must have passed through a door to the right of the hall as one faces the platform, and then, turning to the left, in a well-lighted corridor, he must have proceeded to locate the operating room. He was trying to locate it, remember. He passed a double door on his right and, had he turned the knob of the right leaf of this door, he could have passed into the operating room. Instead, he continued a few steps further, and there, to his right, was another double door, with window panes in the upper halves. Through these panes he looked into the dark operating room and could see the rays of light from the lenses and the faces of the operators faintly. Here was his goal. The problem was how to open the door, for the leaves were of the sliding kind, operated by a compound lever. He must have shaken the door (which was a new one) and loosened the catch to the left from its lock; then slid the left leaf to the right and stepped into what he supposed was the room, in the darkness. Instead, it was the yawning mouth of the elevator shaft, and he pitched forward and fell headlong eighteen feet below, striking on the floor of the elevator on his head.

This opening of the door is not based on mere supposition, for Mr. Kerr, in the exhibition business in Dayton, who was in the operating room at the time and about fifteen feet away, saw Mr. Chalmers open the door. Not recognizing him, he thought he was an employe of the N. C. R. Co. and knew what he was doing. Mr. Chalmers could not see Mr. Kerr on account of the darkness in the operating room, and, as he took the fatal step, Mr. Kerr knew, when too late, that he was not an N. C. R. employe. Mr. Kerr's father had met his death some years before in a similar accident, and seeing this unknown man fall before his eyes, affected him so strongly that he was seized with nausea that lasted half an hour.

Strange to relate, John M. Bradlet and W. A. Pettis, vice-president of the Ohio League, were in the operating room at the same time, about twenty feet away from the shaft, as was afterwards testified to before the Coroner. Neither knew of the presence of the other, owing to the darkness, although only about five feet apart. Mr. Bradlet states that he did not investigate, being averse to view such sights, but he could see on looking down the shaft that the Emergency Hospital staff of the N. C. R. Co. was removing the injured man. The light was so dim he could not distinguish any object clearly.

Down on the basement floor, a few yards away from the elevator, at the time of the accident, Frank Mytinger, who works in the slide department of the N. C. R. Co., heard a cry and the fall of a body. He rushed to the elevator, where Mr. Chalmers lay groaning. He did not recognize him (although he had met him once), owing to the poor light. Mr. Mytinger is well known in film circles in Chicago.

The rumor spread that the injured man was Mr. Kenfield, of the A. H. Andrews Co., Chicago, and one of his assistants went at once to the Emergency Hospital to learn the truth. He was taken into the operating room and discovered that it was not Mr. Kenfield. At the same time he expressed the belief that he had met the injured man. When the surgeon showed him a letter taken from Mr. Chalmers' pocket, he immediately recognized the name and rushed back to tell Mr. Bradlet.

Meantime the N. C. R. Co.'s surgeon, seeing that Mr. Chalmers was most seriously injured, conveyed him to the Miami Hospital, nearby, where a consultation was held with leading surgeons of the institution, and all that surgical skill could perform was done for the patient. Special nurses were called in to assist in the fight for life, but from the first there was little, if any, hope. At 6:15 o'clock, Wednesday morning, March 27, Mr. Chalmers passed away, and the world of moving pictures lost one of its most zealous and optimistic workers.

There is great consolation for his relatives and friends in the knowledge that Mr. Chalmers knew no suffering. This was the one mercy vouchsafed in his case, in the completion of "the sore tattered tapestry of life."

It was not until nearly 5 o'clock in the afternoon that I heard of the accident. This was due to the fact that I accompanied the delegates and visitors on a survey of the N. C. R. Co.'s plant, which occupied over one hour. The entire party was subdivided into many smaller ones, so that each of the latter could be carried in one of the large elevators. Each of these smaller parties was in the care of a guide, and I often wondered why it was that I never encountered the party to which Mr. Chalmers had been allotted. I had boarded the car for the city when I encountered C. H. Pyle, manager of Miss Martha Russell, who told me of the accident. I then went back to the general office of the N. C. R. Co., where I met Mr. Bradlet. A telegram was then sent to John Wiley, business manager of The Moving Picture World.

Mr. Bradlet made all necessary preparations for the shipment of the remains to New York, preparatory to the arrival of Mr. Wiley, who came into Dayton Thursday morning. He departed the same evening on a Pennsylvania train, being accompanied to the depot by Mr. and Mrs. O. B. Weaver and Wm. Seeley, of Dayton, and John M. Bradlet.

After the accident and after the death of Mr. Chalmers I was deeply impressed by the sincere sympathy and sorrow expressed by numerous people, in various branches of the film business, whom I met. Indeed, the tragedy cast a deep gloom over the entire convention, and many were opposed to engaging in any part of the program that was not confined strictly to business. Deep respect for his memory and heartfelt regret for his untimely end will be long retained, for James P. Chalmers, by men in all branches of the film industry.

SELIG PICTURE SUGGESTED BY SELIG'S PICTURE.

"The End of the Romance," the Selig Polyscope Co.'s release of April 16th, has had somewhat of a romance of its own.

Some time ago Mr. W. N. Selig, president of the Selig Polyscope Co., returned from one of his trips abroad, bearing with him a very high priced and well known original painting in oil by the noted German artist, L. Max Ehrler. Mr. Selig, who is somewhat of an art connoisseur, prized this particular work so highly that he gave instructions to have it hung in his beautifully decorated private office at the Chicago plant. Here it at once attracted attention and admiration from all who viewed it. The painting, wonderfully lifelike, shows a young lady in the act of burning, over a candle, the photograph of her lover.

The painting had been hung scarcely a week before the scenario editor found himself literally swamped with scenarios founded upon the romance suggested in the painting. Practically everyone in the immense plant had received the same inspiration. From among this mass of material one was finally selected and placed in production.

The matter was not mentioned to Mr. Selig, and when he sat in the vault the other day and witnessed for the first time a living portrayal of his beloved art subject, his surprise was genuine to say the least.

AMERICAN TO RELEASE REMARKABLE SUBJECT.

"Her Mountain Home" is the title of a very able piece of work that will be released by the American Film Mfg. Co. on Thursday, April 25th. It is a distinctively odd subject. The opening pictures show a wide and cheerless expanse of dry, barren alkali desert. Immediately in the foreground, with face painfully lined and every evidence of intense suffering, lying flat on the ground, we see a man in the throes of death by thirst. Suddenly his nervously working hand closes on a pebble when—lo!—the magic thought, "Gold!" changes the dying man's expression and lights it with a ghastly ray of hope. Such is the power of gold.

He is rescued and later we see him and a chum join in the rush for the new gold field. In that motley crowd we see the rough adventurers of the West, coarse women, mingling into the homogeneous types of humanity that follow in the wake of gold. The hurried packing, restive horses attached to prairie schooners, the populace hurrying hither and thither with newly obtained claim deeds, all serve to make a striking portrayal of that most interesting of Western events—the rush for gold!

BRADY THE POSTER MAN MOVES.

Arthur Brady, one of the pioneers in motion picture publicity, has just finished his spring moving. He has taken up new and large quarters at 124 East 14th St., New York City, where he will have elbow room for himself and his customers. Brady is doing a land-office business in the poster rental and supply business.

Mr. Brady is qualified for the place he fills, because he worked up from the proper beginnings. He was known as "The Aesthetic Sign Painter" when the movies were in their infancy. He got into the moving picture business by painting cards and banners. Later he began to carry a small stock of posters, but the poster branch, increasing with the rapid growth of cinematography, finally became the main part of Mr. Brady's business, and this same poster business became one of the largest in this country by the simple process of evolution.

The Moving Picture Educator

"SAUL AND DAVID" (C. G. P. C.)

It is a pleasure to welcome another picture to the too slowly increasing list of educational films and especially of the Biblical order. Additionally interesting because of its coloring, giving richness to the whole, "Saul and David" adds another link to what cannot too soon become a satisfactory series.

Creditable in the main and pleasing to the average beholder, it would be better if the sub-title explained to the less knowing ones the magnanimity of David in sparing Saul's life when it was in his power to take it. Educationally the film can be profitably used by any capable lecturer, or teacher, as interest can be imparted by taking the pictures as a comprehensive illustrator.

The scenes open where David demands of Saul his daughter Michal as wife, in fulfillment of a previous promise. Saul keeps his word, but is later jealous of David's increasing popularity. This jealousy is formed into a murderous hatred when Saul's own son, Jonathan, declares his love for David and refuses to be an avenger of his father's hatred. David, upon Jonathan's advice, flees from Saul, and is helped by the High Priest, who also gives him the sword of Goliath, whom he had previously slain. Saul multiplies his sin in causing the death of the priests who thus helped David.

Following David to the cave in which he with his followers is hiding, Saul spends the night there. While asleep David's guards would slay him, but David interposes. The cause for David's interposition ought to be given here, but it is strangely missing. David would not consent to the "slaying of the Lord's annointed." Cutting off a piece of Saul's garment, David is able the next morning to prove to Saul how nearly he had been to his death. Convinced of the righteousness of David, Saul relents his anger and takes him to his arms as a son, while Jonathan is rejoiced. The abbreviated story is so far well told. The picture is in that stage of satisfaction which these pictures have thus far reached, but like all its predecessors lacking in that thoroughness which would make it more valuable to the "educator." However, we are glad to have it, and ask for more, knowing that they will increase in the power of imparting truth and knowledge as they increase in familiarity of frequent production. All the essentials of a good Biblical picture are present in "Saul and David," and it should be seen by all lovers and students of these pictures who are desirous of encouraging this valuable class of work.

With a closer following of the text and teaching of the original from which these subjects are taken, a large field is open and a larger public waiting to accord them a hearty reception.

"THE BEE" (Eclair).

In happy contrast to the unclean and dangerous housefly, the Eclair Company has a splendid film on the clean, honey-producing bee. The whole process of bee culture is shown in detail from beginning to end. As a series of pictures it is intensly interesting; as a teacher of the value of the bee and its honey-producing powers it is most instructive.

Like its companion picture, "The Fly," it is perfect in its line, because it is both thorough and complete; there is nothing to be added, no deficiency to be rectified. It is as ready for the classroom as a lesson as it is for the theater as an entertainer. With these subjects the educational films have some valuable additions.

INCIDENTS OF THE DURBAR.

Only second in importance to the full records of the famous historical event of the first coronation of an emperor of India, Pathe's "Incidents of the Durbar" are an exceedingly interesting collection. With evident care and good taste several of the most important occasions and some of the most impressive scenes are presented. The enormous plains upon which the great and wonderful city of White was formed is perhaps unsurpassed in splendor; it would scarcely seem possible to produce from the simple tent such conveniences and luxury. The surroundings of several of the Maharajahs were fully equal to the recognized reputation of their wealth and magnificence. Several of these interesting Hindoo rulers are shown in most excellent portraiture. Views of details are given indicative of the character of the whole, including two sections of King George V's personal appearances. For comprehensiveness, views of "a portion of the multitude" show the vast and varied crowd of a nature impossible only in India.

A regiment of soldiers mounted on camels is worthy of special mention as showing the varied nature of the home and foreign troops. As one of the most important historical events in the history of the world it is the privilege of every one not to lose of a nature possible only in India.

A COMBINATION OF INTERESTING SUBJECTS.

The illustrated newspaper (Pathe's Weekly) is always good, but, perforce of circumstance, variable as news must necessarily be. Two recent issues, however, are above the average, making them of commanding interest. It is a pleasure to note both the progressive value of the picture news, as also of the ever increasing interest shown by the world of readers. It is also worthy of notice that the pictures themselves have greatly improved, better views and closer details together with much clearer pictures mark the advance of these most recent issues. Seven countries contribute their most important events, in several of which the rulers are conspicuous; indeed we are rapidly becoming intimately acquainted with the important personages of this world by means of these pictures.

Governmental affairs enter largely in recent events. The delegates from the Lawrence strikers are shown in their appearance before the Congressional Committee on labor conditions in the House Office Building in Washington. President and Mrs. Taft are shown in most excellent likenesses taking their afternoon walk in the White House Grounds. The President is also seen in company with the Governor of Massachusetts and the Mayor of Boston reviewing the Evacuation Day Parade in Boston. Russia and France meet in a remarkable manner when the city councilmen of Paris dedicated in Moscow a monument erected to the memory of those who perished one hundred years ago on the occasion of Napoleon's disastrous retreat from Moscow. An event marking a new era for Spain is the launching of the first battleship of the new navy. This event coming at the time of the burial of the Maine is eloquent of important historical events. The King and Queen of Spain are the central figures.

The continued boiling of Mexican troubles, caused by rulers and would-be rulers, past, present and future, keeps interest in that country alive, besides making us acquainted with many unique characters, teaching lessons in both geography and history.

Austria is represented by the magnificent obsequies of Count Alois d'Aehrenthal, late Minister of Foreign Affairs, whose burial was with splendid military honors.

The authority of the law was perhaps never so strangely pictured as when rivers of wine were set flowing from 184 barrels and 750 bottles, seized by the authorities from illegal drinking resorts; the hearts of many temperance advocates will rejoice as they see this flowing to waste of the accursed fluid. Another and similarly strange picture is that of the New York police throwing into the ocean's depth guns, revolvers by the hundreds, and all classes of weapons, confiscated and taken from lawbreakers and criminals in New York City alone, to the extent of over ten thousand dollars in value.

Aviator Coffyn is seen making his sensational flight over New York City and bay in his hydroplane "The Canvas Back Duck." It is a singular freak of scientific fate that this man has so far proved himself safer in the air than on terra firma. In contrast to this is shown the débris of the monoplane, in which aviator Gilbour met his death in England.

To the joy of the American citizen Col. Roosevelt is depicted doing his duty as a juryman in his home county. Although willing to discharge his functions as a citizen he is rejected by lawyers, who feared his personality would overshadow the real issue. The other extreme in a big citizen is shown in the person of W. F. Brinson, of Georgia, who qualifies as the largest which dieting fails to reduce man in the world (in weight only), as he weighs 600 pounds,

Ohio Motion Picture Exhibitors' League Convention.

THE DAYTON MEETING ECLIPSED ALL FORMER MEETINGS OF THE LEAGUE, NATIONAL OR OTHERWISE.

THE convention held at Dayton by the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of the State of Ohio, on Tuesday and Wednesday, March 26th and 27th, easily eclipsed all previous gatherings of the League in numbers and impressiveness, not excepting even the first national convention at Cleveland, in August last year. The visiting delegates numbered over 180, and including their wives, sisters and friends, who accompanied them, the figures were raised to 350.

The city was attired in handsome holiday dress, some of the finest buildings being decked with flags, from basement to fourteenth story. The streets were thronged with sightseers during the parades of the visitors and, at the Union Depot, the arrival of the delegations from Cleveland, Cincinnati, Columbus and Toledo was witnessed by a throng of residents. More especially was this noticeable at the arrival of the Cincinnati delegation, headed by Mayer's fine band and bearing a large American flag and a handsome banner of that organization. It must be remembered that delegates from nearly all the smaller towns throughout the State were also present.

The importance of the Dayton Meeting had been anticipated by film manufacturers, for there were on the spot veteran camera men from the Pathe Freres and Gaumont forces, Ralph Radnor Earle representing the former company for Pathe's Weekly, and A. Richards, the Gaumont Company. Moving pictures were taken showing the arrival of the Cincinnati delegates and of the grand parade by all the visitors, from the Court House to the Post Office. The latter took place about 2:00 p. m., Tuesday, and was viewed by thousands of people.

The delegates, on arrival, assembled at the Hippodrome, in the Auditorium, about 11 o'clock, where the convention was called to order by M. A. Neff, president of the National League. After a few remarks dwelling on the objects of the League, Mr. Neff appointed several committees to attend to business of the convention and report at the executive meeting, to be held in the Industrial and Educational Hall of the National Cash Register Company, Wednesday.

In this hall the convention reconvened at 2:30 p. m. Tuesday, and Mayor Phillips, of Dayton, delivered the following address of welcome:

Mayor Phillips' Welcome.

"I am most assuredly gratified to be called upon to welcome your organization to our city. Your association is recognized to-day as one of the leading educational institutions of our country and the interest manifested by all classes of our people demonstrates the fact that your efforts for their entertainment are being appreciated by them.

"Not very many of us have had opportunity for travel not only in our own country, but abroad. One can go to almost any of the motion picture theaters to-day and see possibly ancient Egyptian ruins, scenes in the jungles of Africa, actual occurrences in the land of the midnight sun, or, coming to our own United States, life in New York, Chicago or any of the larger cities; the beauties of Yellowstone Park, or life on the Mississippi. Aside from scenes of travel, or those connected with historical events, one may see comedy, tragedy or some pleasing episode of daily happenings almost anywhere. The people are also interested in your performances from a standpoint of recreation and a relief from the toils and struggles of everyday life.

"Again I desire to say that you have come to stay. Therefore, on behalf of the citizens of Dayton and in my position as its chief executive, I bid you a sincere and hearty welcome. May your deliberations and councils be harmonious and profitable, and when you return to your own homes and firesides, I trust that you will look back with much pleasure to your visit to Dayton, the best city in the best State in the best country on the globe."

President Neff's Reply.

"I am sure we all have reason to thank the city of Dayton for the generous reception that has been given us by the mayor and citizens," said Mr. Neff. "I know the Gem City well and feel sure that no man who has partaken of its hospitality, seen its industry, and come into close contact with its citizens can go away without feeling that he has been instructed and entertained.

"Our organization was primarily established for the purpose of uplifting the motion picture business and to eliminate certain phases that were proving to be distasteful to the better classes of people throughout the land. That purpose has been strictly, constantly and religiously adhered to. No man, or interest, can gain admission to this league who is known to be out of sympathy with its aims and purposes. We are, of course, in the business to make money. But we do not want to make money, if in so doing we offend against chastity or degrade the character of our shows.

"Cinematography is educating the people of this country. It is performing a high and lofty mission. The time will come when through its aid the surgeon who now takes four years to graduate will be able to begin to practice in less than a year. It is a marvelous aid to science; it is a splendid ally of the schools and a powerful means of disseminating knowledge that, but for its agency, would require that the seeker after such a blessing would have to wade through hundreds of books and travel over thousands of miles of territory.

"Some persons think the science has reached its zenith and has accomplished all that it is capable of performing. But let me tell you that no bounds can be put to its achievements. You motion picture men are doing a work for humanity that is really not apparent even to yourselves. You are doing something more than merely tickling the fancies of a flippant audience composed of immature maids and swains. You are disseminating knowledge that is of inestimable value to all classes.

"It is all right to enjoy minutes of surcease from toil in a moving picture theater. It is extremely pleasant to have the senses enthralled and the imagination entranced with beautiful and realistic scenes. But when you add to these things the educational value of the motion picture enterprise, you will readily see that you are engaged in a mission that cannot fail to be productive of the most beneficial results to the human race."

Speech of Vice-President of the N. C. R. Co.

Mr. Deeds, vice-president and general superintendent of the National Cash Register Company, was next introduced, and delivered a meaty speech that was received with loud applause at its many telling points. Following is the speech verbatim:

I appreciate very much the hearty response you have given after an introduction of this sort; I appreciate it and will take it for those men that have helped entertain you people and will do so in the next day. We are interested in your work. We are interested for two reasons: one is because you are an organization. There has been one thing that we have tried to advocate—if there is one thing more than anything else, it has been organization. We have spent more time, probably, in our business along that one line than any other one line—that of bringing our organization closer together and bringing it up to the highest state of perfection that we possibly can, and what little success we as a company have attained has been on account of our organization. And I want to congratulate you people—you members of this convention on having gotten together in an organization. I want to congratulate your president, Mr. Neff, on having been able to get together such a body as this. I believe that I am in a position to appreciate more than some of you gentlemen here the amount of work that it has taken on his part to bring about this assemblage and bring about an organization of people whose interests at first seemed diversified, but after all who are all interested in one common thing. And I want to congratulate him on his work and you on the work that you are doing in trying to get together and help push ahead your business, and that is what you are here for—to talk things over.

We are glad to have you here and extend to you a most cordial welcome, so that you can come here with your deliberations. This is a new hall. It has only been used for the conventions of our own people so far, and your convention is the first convention, except the cash register convention, that has ever met in this hall, and I feel as though it couldn't be better dedicated to-day than to the motion picture people. (Great applause.)

The second reason why we are interested in this thing—first because you are organized and get together, and we are in sympathy with any movement along that line—and in the second place we have always believed in the education by pictures. Years ago, before the motion picture was developed, we had, in order to better instruct our people, to get the old-fashioned stereopticon lantern slide, and in our school work, teaching our own people here, we found it a most invaluable thing; in other words, we couldn't run our business to-day if it wasn't for the stereopticon and the lantern slides. It has become a vital part of our organization. The motion picture goes still farther along this same line, and this hall was designed primarily as a place where we can properly exhibit our motion pictures and other pictures before our conventions and the different schools and agents and factory people, so that we could build up our organization.

We are interested in the picture business. We want to see what the latest things are so that we can have them and keep our people up to date. It is an educational process, and you people have the grandest opportunity in the world along that line. It won't be five years—it is to-day, but people don't realize it, but it won't be five years until the whole public is going to realize that the motion picture exhibitors are the most powerful educational factor we have in this country. (Applause.)

You have the opportunity of getting hold of the people and bringing them together here concentrating the advanced ideas from all over the world. There isn't anything so broadening as travel, and the people who cannot travel you are able to bring the thing and lay it down in front of them, just as it actually is, and we want to congratulate you upon your work. At first you had to start out to entertain the people. And we are glad to see that educational films are being run, and in most of our picture shows here in our own city every week and more frequently at times there are certain educational films run along that channel, and you have the grand opportunity and I know you are going to do it.

We appreciate pictures. We couldn't do without them. We can't do without the motion pictures. It is a part of our organization and our educational work here, and you people have the grand opportunity, and we want to congratulate you on being together here as an assemblage to try and work out a better way of pushing your grand good work ahead. We wish you God speed in it. We wish you the most successful convention you can possibly have, and I want to extend to you the hospitality of this factory. It is yours for a day or two. You can have any piece of it or run it any old way you please. (Laughter and applause.) We turn it over to you and you can make any suggestions you want to, and if there is anything over there that you think will help you in your business just take it home with you. (Applause.)

The delegates were then instructed by President Neff to meet in the same hall, on Wednesday morning, at 10 o'clock, in open meeting, and afterwards in private session. In the open meeting the president announced that the officers of the National League had decided in executive session, Tuesday evening, that the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America would be incorporated, and requested all delegates of the Ohio League present to go to an adjoining room and sign the necessary instrument before a notary public. After this had been done the delegates deliberated in closed meeting, which lasted until late in the afternoon.

It was learned that National and State censorship was strongly advocated in the closed meeting, and also that a resolution was passed prohibiting members of the Ohio League from giving away premiums or gifts of any kind at their theaters, for the purpose of inducing patrons to attend.

During the same meeting Max Stearn, owner of the Exhibit Theater, Columbus, Ohio, announced his resignation as treasurer of the Ohio League, owing to pressure of business. O. B. Weaver, a prominent business man of Dayton and owner of the Lyceum Theater there, was unanimously elected to succeed Mr. Stearn, whose discharge of the incumbent duties was highly praised.

Resolutions of sympathy for the relatives of J. P. Chalmers and profound regret for the sad accident that caused his untimely death were drawn up, and C. M. Christiansen, of Cleveland, secretary of the National League, was instructed by the members of the national executive committee to put them in the proper form and forward them to the Moving Picture World, New York.

At the closed session, Wednesday afternoon, a vote was taken as to what city should secure the next Ohio convention. Toledo outvoted all others, it being decided to hold the next convention of the Ohio delegates in the Maumee City, the second week of July. Among the strong fighters for the selection of Toledo were E. R. Kelsey, Dr. W. V. Prentice, D. C. Dyer, John Braunschweiger, O. L. Brailey, Mr. Levy, Mr. Rodgers and Will C. Bettis, all residents of Toledo.

As arrangements involving considerable expense had been made for the banquet, Wednesday evening, at the officers' club dining rooms of the N. C. R. Co., by the Dayton delegation, it was concluded to hold it, although the delegates would have preferred to observe their respect for Mr. Chalmers' memory to the letter. Congressman Lentz was one of the notable speakers at the banquet.

Transactions of Officers of National League.

On Monday evening the officers of the National League present in Dayton met and transacted business. There were present: M. A. Neff, president; vice-presidents Wm. J. Sweeney, of Chicago; Mr. Dickson, of Winchester, Ind.; Fred Herrington, of Pittsburgh; S. E. Morris, of Cleveland; F. Brylawski, of Washington, D. C., and Mr. Ullman, of Michigan (Mr. Phillips, of Wisconsin, was absent); Mr. Reider, of Michigan, treasurer, and C. M. Christiansen, of Cleveland, secretary.

During the meeting Missouri and Kentucky were given the right to organize, and preliminary steps were taken for the organization of the State of New York. West Virginia, organized three weeks ago, was admitted to the national organization. Mr. Brylawski, of Washington, D. C., was elected vice-president of the National Association, subject to the approval of the Washington, D. C., local. As has been referred to, the national officers, at a special meeting held Wednesday, framed resolutions of sympathy and regret concerning the death of Mr. Chalmers.

It should not be omitted to state that Wm. J. Sweeney, vice-president of the National Association and treasurer of the Chicago local, was one of the most popular men at the convention. His appearance on the platform was always the signal for applause, and his genial temperament added still further to his wide circle of friends.

Independent film manufacturers were represented by the following: J. E. Brulator, president of the Distributing and Sales Co. and president of the Eclair Co.; Harry R. Raver, manager Eclair Co.; Mark Dintenfass, of the champion; A. Kessel, of the Bison Co.; Herbert Miles, of the Republic; Carl Laemmle, of the Imp; Tom Evans, of the Powers Moving Picture Co., C. Simone, of the Nestor Co., and R. R. Nehls, of the American. Mr. Blair, representing the Eastman Co., of Rochester, N. Y., was also present.

Among the trade newspaper men present were Allen L. Haase, of Motography; William Lord Wright, of the Moving Picture News, and Mr. Mayer, of the Billboard; Jas. S. McQuade, J. P. Chalmers and J. M. Bradlet, of the Moving Picture World.

Among those present representing manufacturing supply houses and other products connected with the film business were the following: J. W. Kenfield and J. M. McLaughlin, of the A. H. Andrews Company, Chicago; E. E. Fulton, 154 W. Lake Street, Chicago; Herbert Griffin, of the American Moving Picture Company, New York; Eric Morrison, of the same company; John Cooper, of the Sterling Economizer Company, Warren, Ohio; Lindsey A. Woodward, and L. E. Neukom, of the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company, Chicago; Scott S. Wilson, of the National Carbon Company, Cleveland; F. W. Swett, of the Nicholas Power Company, New York, and Robert Hope Jones, lecturer for the Wurlitzer Moving Picture Orchestra, built by the Rudoplh Wurlitzer Company, Dayton, Ohio. Much sympathy was extended Mr. Swett, of the Nicholas Power Company, owing to the sudden death of his mother which recalled him to New York immediately.

It is to be regretted that the local committee in Dayton in charge of the list of delegates and visitors to the convention omitted to furnish the names to the press, although repeated efforts were made to obtain them. At least eight attempts were made on my behalf to secure the list. It would be well at future conventions of the League, if several copies of the list of names were made from the books for the especial use of the press, as it is impossible for representatives of the press to secure the books to copy the list personally. It would be also wise to have a press committee appointed to furnish visiting representatives of the press at future conventions with verbatim speeches taken down by the official stenographer, and to furnish such matter concerning the business of closed sessions as it might be deemed expedient to furnish the trade press.

DAILY FILM, VAUDEVILLE AND SONG RECORD.

Mr. W. F. Barrett, of the Crystal Palace Film Exchange, Toronto, Canada, has sent us a sample copy of his Daily Film, Vaudeville and Song Record. It is a neatly bound blankbook with box ruling for the various items and totals. The book is bound in cardboard, mounted with green linen, upon which is a very tasty title beautifully printed. The volume is about an inch smaller, each way, than the size of the Moving Picture World, and about as thick.

For an exhibitor using a medium number of reels per show, the book should prove a very useful and convenient article. It does not appear whether the book is given away as an ad by Brother Barrett or whether it is a regular stock blankbook on sale at a stated price. It is a good thing in either case.

CHICAGO LETTER.

By Jas. S. McQuade.

THE meeting of Independent manufacturers and exhibitors at the Hotel Sherman, Saturday afternoon, March 30, was held behind closed doors. The call for the meeting had been sent out by Joseph Hopp, of the Standard exchanges in Chicago and Louisville, about ten days before, and the representation from all parts of the country fairly astonished those present.

The two main objects of the meeting were: First—An arrangement between exchanges and the manufacturers, by which films should be leased and not sold to exchanges. By this means it is sought to enforce the retirement of films monthly, so as to eliminate, eventually, worn out films from the market and, incidentally, to force junk dealing firms out of the business.

Second—It was sought to induce the manufacturers to outline a plan whereby each exchange shall have a defined territory, thus preventing conflict of bookings among exhibitors and insuring a better service for each.

Joseph Hopp, chairman of the meeting, named a committee of exchange men, who, after an hour in conference, drafted a resolution embodying the foregoing aims and requesting the manufacturers to co-operate with exchange men in bringing about the proposed changes. The exchange committee also requested the manufacturers to appoint a committee to meet its members in joint conference. This was done, the manufacturers on the committee being J. E. Brulatour, Carl Laemmle, Edwin Thanhouser, David Horsley, Herbert Miles and Chas. Bauman. S. S. Hutchinson was appointed advisory member to this committee.

The members of the exchange committee are Joseph Hopp, chairman: J. W. Morgan, secretary; J. E. Fitzjarrel, W. E. Greene, A. Davis and E. Olson. J. R. Freuler was appointed advisory member to the committee.

On Saturday night the two committees met at dinner, in the Walnut room of the Hotel Sherman, and interchanged opinions until a late hour. It was decided to postpone further discussion until Thursday, April 4th, after the manufacturers' committee meets in New York. It is then expected that Chairman Brulatour, for the manufacturers, will call a meeting of the two committees, in Atlantic City, sometime this month. Should the committees agree on a plan of procedure at Atlantic City, a call will be issued for a meeting of all Independent exchanges and manufacturers, in Chicago, in the near future.

The following manufacturers, or their representatives, were present: J. E. Brulatour and Harry R. Raver, of Eclair; Carl Laemmle, of the Imp; Mark Dintenfass, of the Champion; David Horsley, of the Nestor; Herbert Miles, of the Republic; Joe Engel, of the Rex; S. S. Hutchison, of the American; Edwin Thanhouser, of the Thanhouser Co.; A. Kessel and Chas. Bauman, of the Bison; Tom Cochrane, of the Majestic; Tom Evans, of the Powers Co.; D. W. McKinney and Frank Winch, representing the Sales Co.

Among the exchange men present were: Joseph Hopp, of the Standard Exchanges, Chicago and Louisville; Maurice Fleckles, of the Laemmle Exchanges in Chicago, Minneapolis, Omaha and Des Moines; C. J. Hite, of the H. & H. and Majestic Exchanges, Chicago; C. C. Plough, of the Anti-Trust Film Co., Chicago; Mr. Bailey, of the Pacific Flm Exchange, Butte, Mont., and the Independent Western Film Exchange, Portland, Ore.; Mr. Nolan, of the Swanson Exchange, Denver; A. F. Beck, Central Film Service, Indianapolis; J. R. Freuler, Western Film Exchanges of Milwaukee, Kansas City and New York; E. Olson, Wichita Film & Supply Co., Wichita, Kan.; L. Oldnow, Consolidated Film & Supply Co.'s offices of New Orleans, Birmingham and Dallas; W. E. Greene, Greene Film Exchange, Boston; J. E. Fitzjarrel, Baltimore Film Exchange, Baltimore; William Klatt, Michigan Film & Supply Co., Detroit; J. W. Morgan, Morgan Film Service, Kansas City; Sam Werner, Swanson-Crawford Exchange, St. Louis; Art. Schmidt, Victor Film Service of Buffalo, and Rex Film Exchange of Albany, N. Y.; J. Schnitzer, Toledo Film Exchange, Toledo, and Victor Film Service of Cleveland; E. E. Mandelbaum, Lake Shore Film Service, Cleveland, and Lake Shore and Buckeye, Columbus; A. Davis, Independent Film Exchange and Pittsburgh Photoplay Co., Pittsburgh; A. Kessel, the Empire Film Exchange, Great Eastern, Peerless and Metropolitan, all of New York City, and Herbert Miles, representing Miles Bros., of San Francisco and Los Angeles.

Chicago Film Brevities.

It is said that the Pennsylvania Exhibitors' League intends holding a convention in June, at Pittsburgh. What with the recent meeting at Dayton, the Toledo convention set for July, and the national convention to be held in Chicago, in August, it would certainly seem as if exhibitors are inclined to overdo the convention scheme. It might be wise to go slow and hold conventions after proper intervals, so that each will receive the necessary patronage and result in the right measure of success.

The Photoplay Magazine has added Neil G. Caward to its staff, as associate editor. Mr. Caward is a well-known journalist, who began his career on the Minneapolis Journal. For a long time he has written special articles for a prominent publication syndicate. A. W. Thomas, a resident of Marion, Ohio, who has discharged editorial duties, will assist in the scenario department.

T. K. Valloss, of Chicago, has purchased the state rights of "Twenty Years in Sing Sing" for Iowa and Arkansas, and opened his exhibition tour last Monday, April 1st.

The plant of the Parisian Manufacturing & Film Renovating Co. was visited last week by a representative of The World. It is a thoroughly up-to-date, progressive business establishment, with a floor space of over 4,000 feet, and well equipped with modern appliances for the development, printing and cleaning of films by the Parisian process. Fred L. Tilley, the president and general manager of the company, states that he has purchased the sole rights for using the Parisian cleansing system of films in America. Mr. Tilley formerly resided in Detroit, and at one time was connected with the Urban Trading Co., of London, for five years. Mr. Tilley is much encouraged by the patronage already given him by Licensed and Independent Film Exchanges in the cleaning of films.

C. S. Sullivan, owner of the Royal Theater, Escanaba, Mich., purchased the Cosy Theater, Marinette, Wis., on Monday, March 11th. Licensed service is furnished both houses by the G. F. Co.'s branch at 17-19 S. Wabash. Mr. Sullivan stated that the winter business has been very good in Escanaba.

J. E. Becknell, manager of the Marion Theater, Iron Mountain, Mich., was a visitor at the office of the World last week. He will be remembered as the manager of the Merritt and Victoria theaters of Chicago. The Marion was opened January 1st. It has a capacity of 395, representing an investment of $5,000. It is owned by Mr. Becknell and Mrs. Marion Higgie.

ANDERSON IN ROLE OF INDIAN.

Mr. G. M. Anderson, director and producer of the Essanay Western company located at Lakeside, Cal., shows his ability to adapt himself to widely different roles in two splendid Western dramas soon to be released. In "Under Mexican Skies," booked for April 13th, Mr. Anderson plays the role of Pasquale, a Mexican vaquero, and in "The Indian and the Child," released April 27th, he portrays a half-breed Indian with marvelous effect when it is considered how little make-up is employed in the moulding of the character. Mr. Anderson is a great believer in the art of facial expression to carry out conceptions of characters, instead of the use of heavy make up, and his ability in this art is only too well known throughout the entire film-world.

KETTLER ON THE JOB.

Carl Kettler, Jr., the moving picture man of South Florida, or better known as the photoplay crank of Palm Beach, is certainly one of the leading photoplay exhibitors of this country. Mr. Kettler, who is owner and manager of the Kettler's Photoplay Theater, of Palm Beach, Fla., has been showing nothing but the world's best and latest Licensed photoplays to crowded houses during the entire season.

Mr. Kettler says his great success is due to the great assistance and teachings which he has obtained by reading the greatest photoplay magazine ever published or better known the world over as the "Moving Picture World."

If every motion picture exhibitor throughout this country was to operate his or their theater as Mr. Kettler does his, the moving picture industry throughout the world to-day would be at least 100 per cent. better.

Pictures from the Maine Woods

Series of Novel Subjects Taken by the Edison Company Soon to Appear—A Touching Comedy Drama.

DURING the coldest months of the winter just passed a company of Edison players, under the direction of Mr. Oscar C. Apfel, spent about six weeks along the Kennebeck River, Maine, making pictures of the various industries of that region, interwoven with which are bits of life's comedy and drama to add zest to the portrayal. Notwithstanding that the snow was from three to four feet deep and the temperature hovered away down around 30 degrees below zero, some excellent pictures were made. Such conditions usually develop static electricity in annoying quantities, to the destruction of thousands of feet of film when not properly guarded against, but the Edison camera man was remarkably fortunate in eliminating that element and his negatives proved to be entirely free from "static." Thus the Edison company is able to offer some fine pictures of the wilds of Maine in the depth of winter.

Logging Scene from "The Boss of the Lumber Camp" (Edison).

The first of the subjects to be released is entitled "The Boss of the Lumber Camp." This picture is the first of a series dealing with the logging industry of Maine as it relates to the manufacture of paper. In it is shown the work of piling up the logs. A dramatic story is worked into this subject and it is very interesting. Briefly: John Warner, a lumberman, sends his son, Willis, to the woods to cure him of some of his bad habits. The boy's sister follows a little later to keep her brother from getting lonesome. There she meets Bob Foster, a college man, who is in charge of the camp. Bob tries to keep Willis out of trouble, but the boy loses heavily while gambling with the men and is caught cheating. The men determine to punish the young man, but Bob rescues him from the clutches of the infuriated men and he hides in the cabin while his sister, quickly donning men's clothes, leads his pursuers off the trail until Willis shall have time to get safely away from camp. The ruse succeeds and the story concludes quite naturally in a happy understanding between Bob and the sister with her father's approval.

"THE LITTLE WOODEN SHOE" (Edison).

Bannister Merwin has provided the Edison players a touching bit of life in the subject "The Little Wooden Shoe," which will be released April 23. It is one of those "heart interest" stories which dig down deep into one's sympathies. While the Edison company claims no monopoly on this class of picture, it has been singularly alone in the production of them.

In this story Burton Prentice, a husband and father, is a drunkard. In despair his wife leaves their baby upon the doorstep of a well-to-do stranger in hope that it will thus be spared the poverty from which she sees no escape. In her haste the frantic mother leaves behind one of the baby's woolen shoes. The shock of losing his little daughter brings the father to his senses and in the years that follow he becomes prosperous. During all this time the parents have made every effort to locate and regain their child, but have not succeeded. Finally, while riding in their automobile, a break-down compels them to stop near a pretty suburban home and the owner invites them to come in while the machine is being repaired. A children's party is in progress and "hunt the slipper" is the game with which the children are being entertained. The little hostess has brought her little woolen shoe into the game just as the parents enter. They do not recognize the child, who has grown past their recollection, but the mother knows the little shoe at once. Explanations follow and the long lost child is once more restored. See illustration on page 131.

MISS ROSEMARY THEBY.

Rosemary Theby is a St. Louis girl who started to work before the camera about six months ago. Her previous stage experience had been more brief than that of most photoplayers, but her unusually clean-cut features and distinct type, as well as her natural ability, qualified her to enter directly into motion picture work and make good from the start. After serving a brief time in minor roles she was given an opportunity to do something better, and the way in which she did it inspired still further confidence and brought her more important parts. In this way she has advanced in a short space of time to a foremost position, and is at present essaying roles that are exacting and call for a finished player.

Miss Theby is of the pronounced brunette type, slightly oriental in character. Her personality is well adapted to heavy leads and no doubt some day she will give us some great characterizations. We would call attention to her impersonation of "Ruth" in the latest Vitagraph biblical production, "The Illumination," in which picture her work speaks for itself.

KINEMACOLOR CHANGES HOUSES.

On Monday, April 8, the New York exhibition of the "Durbar" in Kinemacolor was transferred from the New York Theater, 45th Street and Broadway, to the Garden Theater, at 27th Street and Madison Avenue. There the exhibition will be known as the second edition of "Durbar" pictures, for the reason that several new views have been added, showing some of the closing events of the festive season of the Coronation. Probably the most interesting of all the additions to the program will be the Kinemacolor views of the "Burial of the Maine." For marine views Kinemacolor is like nature itself, and a glimpse of the moss-covered Maine going down for the last time, is equal, through this medium, to being at the scene itself.

London Letter.

London, March 16th, 1912.

THE picture theater business in Great Britain is flourishing. In those specific cases where it is otherwise it will be found that local conditions and backward ideas on the part of the picture theater manager are the causes. The day of the little moving picture here has passed. The shop or similar sized small building hastily converted into a "theater" is passing away, no matter how low the prices of admission are. The money is being made in the specially built, comfortable, roomy buildings with handsome entrance lobbies where queues can wait in comfort. Simplicity is the note of the internal decorations, and such little incidental comforts as free tea and coffee are not neglected.

In the handsomely arranged picture theaters in the West End of London, showing the best films, admission prices are sixpence (12 cents), one shilling (24 cents), eighteen pence (36 cents) and sometimes two shillings (48 cents), the latter price being very rare. Seats cannot be booked ahead like they can in a theater or a music hall. The visitor takes them as they come. Performances on the whole run from three o'clock in the afternoon to eleven o'clock at night. Sunday opening is pretty universal despite strong Sabbatarian protests. On that day the moving picture theaters open at six, and the net proceeds are usually in aid of a charitable institution in order to comply with the law of Sunday opening, which is very stringent in this country.

Topical Pictures Favored.

The class of show favored by the British public has tended to change along with the class of theater. Cinematograph news in the form of the "Pathe Gazette," "Gaumont Graphic," the "Warwick Gazette," and the "Topical Budget" are features in practically every theater and are looked forward to with extreme interest. If any criticism is leveled at the class of news given, it is perhaps that too much attention is paid to certain unimportant ceremonies such as the laying of foundation stones, small military reviews, and the lesser movements of royalty or public personages. This is perhaps somewhat of a national characteristic as, on the other hand, pictures showing the launching of big new battleships are special attractions that draw the audiences here.

Long films are growing to be the star features of both the West End and the suburban picture theaters. I refer to films running to quite 3,000 feet and playing an hour. These are certainly increasingly popular and their production evidently warrants considerable expenditure on local advertising both in the newspapers of the district and by posters (pictorial and otherwise) on the hoardings. A very popular line all 'round the suburban and provincial theaters, but not so much in the West End, is the Asta Nielsen series featuring that striking Danish actress and always in pictures about the above length.

Nature and travel subjects are always safe lines, as are also the leading American, French, and Italian dramatic pictures. There are signs, however, that the public is being over well fed with "comic chase" and "magic" pictures.

Hand-colored films are gradually coming into use and are regarded with high favor as a welcome contrast to the black and white picture. Cinematography in natural colors is not much seen here yet, the principal home of this being the Scala Theater, London, featuring Kinemacolor pictures and giving two shows a day at three o'clock in the afternoon and eight in the evening, higher prices than ordinary being charged. This theater is most successful and one rarely sees many vacant seats there.

Reverting to the ordinary picture theaters, programs are usually changed twice weekly and on rare occasions three times a week. The number of items upon the program will vary, of course, according to whether or not there is a 3,000-ft. film showing. The average number of pictures shown, including the news collection as one item, is seven or eight. This is reduced to five usually should there be a one-hour drama on the bill. The total time for a complete round of pictures varies from 1½ hours to 2¼ hours. On Sundays and Saturday afternoons, in order to accommodate the extra big crowds that frequent the shows on those more or less holiday occasions, a picture or two is usually cut out in order to change the audience as frequently as possible and provide seats for the people who will be found waiting in the queues outside.

Few Prominent Actors in Pictures.

English actors of rank have not yet figured upon the cinematograph films so well and so frequently as have those of other countries. This is being gradually changed, however, and there is no reason why such distinguished members of the British stage as Arthur Bouchier, Sir George Alexander, Martin Harvey, Forbes Robertson, Fred Terry, Robert Loraine, Violet Vanburgh, Ellen Terry, Lena Ashwell and Julia Neilson should not become as popular with cinematograph audiences as they are with those who visit the ordinary theaters.

I hear in this connection that Sir Herbert Tree's production of "Macbeth" is about to be "filmed" for the cinematograph and that the fee to be paid is $20,000. Sir Herbert's "Henry VIII" has been on the cinematograph for some time. The fee seems enormous, but it must be remembered that all the scenery and fittings have to be transported to a daylight theater specially built for this business.

Pictures Aid Army Recruiting.

The use of cinematograph pictures for helping army recruiting in this country is beginning to attract attention. Enterprising commanding officers are turning their attention to the cinematograph for recruiting purposes, and inquiry shows that moving pictures are likely to be somewhat extensively used this summer to stimulate in the youth of the country an interest in camp and army life.

"In foreign countries military authorities seem much more alive to the educational value of the cinematograph than they are in this country," said a gentleman in the London office of Pathe Freres to your correspondent. "Both in France and Germany the cinematograph is largely used in the army, and we have already done a number of films for these countries. But recently we have had several inquiries from commanding officers to take scenes in camps—infantry, cyclists, cavalry, drills, and so on — and we frequently give private shows. Some short time ago, by permission of Colonel Nugent, the commander, we took a film of the Irish Guards' parade drill. We have also taken films for private customers with a view to their being exhibited in various territorial drill halls, and lectures given on them. We are waking up in this country, there is no doubt. On many occasions lately when we have taken pictures of flights of army aviators or airships, experts have come to our private exhibition theaters to study the films, and prominent aviators say that they can learn more of their mistakes, and the best way of remedying them, by watching themselves in flight than from a fortnight's practice—and, of course, without the risks. The picture of the Lebaudy airship at Aldershot, which we were fortunate enough to secure, was of considerable value in enabling the authorities to discover the cause of the accident."

The New Townsend Bill.

Another Try at the Infringement Immunity Bill with the Penalty Increased to $5,000.

By Epes Winthrop Sargent.

Because of the very active opposition of the Society of American Dramatists and Composers and the National Society of Producing Managers, the House Bill, 20,596, generally known as the Townsend bill, which limited to $100 the damages to be collected by the holder of title of any copyright work which had been infringed for photoplay purposes, has been withdrawn and a new bill (H. R. 22,350) substituted, in which has been incorporated some of the features of the so-called Moon bill (H. R. 21,295), which provides for the copyrighting of unpublished motion pictures by means of scenario or description and identifying frames from the film.

The Townsend feature of the current bill now provides that:

> ". . . in the case of the infringement of an undramatized or non-dramatic work by means of motion pictures, where the infringer shall show that he was not aware that he was infringing, and that such infringement could not have been reasonably foreseen, such damage shall not exceed the sum of one hundred dollars nor be less than the sum of fifty dollars; and in the case of an infringement of a copyrighted dramatic or dramatico-musical work by a maker of motion pictures and his agencies for distribution thereof to exhibitors, where such infringer shows that he was not aware that he was infringing a copyrighted work, and that such infringement could not have reasonably been foreseen, the entire sum of such damages recoverable by the copyright proprietor from such infringing maker and his agencies for the distribution to exhibitors of such infringing motion picture shall not exceed the sum of five thousand dollars nor be less than two hundred and fifty dollars.

Protects the Exchange, Too.

It will be noted that this new bill extends the immunity to the exchange as well as the maker of motion pictures, but still leaves the exhibitor to shift for himself in meeting any legal action due to his use of the infringing copy. This may be due to the fact that in the test case of Harper & Brothers vs. Kalem Co., certain exhibitors made use of duped prints after the originals had been called in, and again it may have been because the exhibitor is not a part of the General Film Company. The Motion Picture Patents Company was represented at the first hearing by John J. O'Connell and the Edison Company by Frank L. Dyer.

It seems purely to be a bill in the interest of the Licensed companies as is evidenced by the fact that while immunity must of necessity extend to the Independents the Moon section of the bill seems to be framed purely in the interest of the Licensed product, since it provides that unpublished motion pictures may be copyrighted by entry of the scenario and identifying frames, one from each scene of a photoplay and two or more prints from different parts of an educational or industrial. As the constituent members of the M. P. P. Co. alone lease their product while the others sell or "publish" it, it will be seen that the Licensed films may procure copyright protection for a sum not exceeding five dollars each, while the film alone for two thousand-foot prints required to gain protection for an Independent picture represents an outlay of sixty dollars. These prints may be returned in the discretion of the Librarian of Congress and his Register of Copyrights, or they may be retained in the library or sent to other governmental or public institutions.

Prevents Photoplay Registration.

To further clinch the matter the new bill not only strikes out the provision of the Moon bill providing for the acceptance for registration of photoplay scenarios, but substitutes a new clause expressly prohibiting the acceptance of such works, the exact phrasing being the words added in parenthesis, "not to include mere scenarios."

At the present time the acceptance of scenarios for registration has been left to the discretion of Mr. Thorvald Solberg, the Register of Copyrights, and he seems to have made his rulings along the lines advanced in this publication to the effect that a photoplay is not a scenario in that it is possible to make a complete dramatic production from a photoplay script, which it is manifestly impossible to do from the scenario of a dramatic work.

Lines four and five on page two of the new bill rigidly prevent the copyrighting of scenarios for protective purposes as is now done bv the Reliance and other companies. It is time that the Sales Company and its members give the bill their attention.

De Luxe Pictures in Chicago.

SATURDAY afternoon, March 30th, the Music Hall of the Fine Arts Building was opened as a moving picture theater de luxe. This has long been a need in this city, and I, of course, was one of the first to see the show. The program was excellent, consisting of four reels of Licensed films, with very fine intermission music. The films included were: "Radgrune" (C. G. P. C.), "The Lighthouse Keeper's Daughter" (Edison), "Incidents of the Durbar at Delhi" (Edison), and "Rice and Old Shoes" (Lubin)—all of them under a week old, though none first run.

In justice, however, something must be said about the projection, which was not by any means in keeping with the rest of the program. The machines were not to be blamed, as they were brand new. But the operators seemed to be new, also, as I overheard one of them say to the younger, "You are running that too fast." It seems a pity that the fortunes of an enterprise like this should be entrusted to green operators, or apprentices. The patrons of a de luxe theater have a right to expect something better in every way than they are given in the ordinary five or ten-cent picture theater, and the projection ought to receive its due attention, as well as the music. It is worthy of note that the musicians did their work without any hitch or halt of any kind, while the operating was of a standard much lower than the average of the ordinary nickel show. To be specific, the light was deficient in quantity, the carbons were often neglected till the lower part of the picture was dark, the matter of speed received too much attention of the wrong kind, films were threaded out of frame, once even with the emulsion toward the lens, causing a long stop, while the machine was rethreaded. To be sure, it was a first show, but I have seen a road show in this same hall where everything went smoothly, without a flaw. The lamps were wired up on the foolish double-throw switch plan, the disadvantages of which are plain, as it throws all work on one rheostat, and forces one to start a reel on new carbons without burning them long enough to form a crater properly. In addition to all this, the shutter of one machine was badly out of time, and it was the machine which was in use for three of the four reels.

The music was very fine, and received considerable applause. It consisted of instrumental numbers of various kinds, and was quite in keeping with what should be presented in a de luxe entertainment.

Still, the music is not the whole show, and unless the projection is brought up to a standard far above the average of the best picture theaters of the city, the success of the de luxe theater will not be quite complete. C. Y.

TWO POWERS PLAYERS.

Since introducing the new "Duplex" studios, the Powers Picture Company have made very rapid strides in the line of quality. Mr. Evans, general manager of the Powers Co., is continually on the lookout for artists in all departments to further improve the quality of the Powers product, and as a result has surrounded himself with a stock company and directing staff second to none.

MISS FRITZI BRUNETTE.

Miss Fritzi Brunette and William A. Williams, whose photographs are herewith reproduced, have been identified as leaders of the stock company for the past year.

Miss Brunette, though still a young lady in her teens, has had a long and varied experience in the professional world, and on account of her natural ability as an actress, and a very charming personality, she has become one of the most popular photoplay actresses.

MR. SPITZER IN NEW YORK.

Mr. N. H. Spitzer, Eastern manager for the American Theater Curtain and Supply Company, of St. Louis, Mo., arrived in New York City last week, and, until such time that he gets permanently located in his own quarters, will receive mail and other correspondence at the office of the Moving Picture World.

EIGHT COMEDIES FROM ESSANAY.

The Essanay Company announces eight corking original comedies, four exciting and superb dramas, and five world's greatest Western dramas featuring that great photoplay star, G. M. Anderson, for the month of April. Think of it! Seventeen magnificent features for one month, all produced and photographed the right way—the Essanay way! Nuff sed!

Studio Saunterings.

By Louis Reeves Harrison

I HAD an unusual opportunity to study Mr. Edison shortly after returning from a three years' residence in France at a moment when he was fresh from a trip to the same country. I was placed opposite him in the arrangement of seats at a Fellowcraft Club dinner, and conversation fell easily into a discussion of French people. He said at the time, whether or not his opinions have changed since then, that French electrical engineers were marvelously well advanced, if anything, superior to our own, and I was impressed by the generosity of this statement, coming as it did from one eminently qualified to praise developments in that particular line at home.

Because of a tendency on my part to study workings of the human mind, men often become greater objects of interest to me than do their achievements. When to this unusual interest in sounding the depths of character is added the more common one of measuring up a man by what he accomplishes for others, rather than by what he does for himself, or from purely sordid motives, it may be readily seen that I was pleasantly impressed by the eminent inventor's broad view of rivals in his chosen field of achievement.

The primitive instinct of self-preservation is one of the most powerful impulses back of human effort—no man can be blamed for struggling hard to take care of his endowment of life—but it is so generally distributed throughout the animal world that it cannot be counted as a distinguishing trait such as the nobility which occasionally leads men to do more for their fellows than for themselves. Washington sacrificed his great private fortune at a moment when he was about to enter a period of domestic happiness; Lincoln gave up everything he valued, even life itself; and these two became more dear to American people because of noble and magnanimous conduct than by any summing up of success and failure in their careers.

Only the man who is generous and considerate is really great, no matter how conspicuous he may become, hence I was glad to note a disposition on the part of the distinguished inventor to accord justice where it was due, and I have since learned that he has limited his activities through an affection for humanity to inventions which are not of the labor-saving kind. Just now it seems as though his greatest light will be one of the kind that illumines the human mind—his ultimate accomplishment may be that of applying moving pictures to educational methods.

If the people of this country have a national fad it is that of improving their children, and if they are universally sensitive on any subject, it concerns whatever might prove injurious to those who live after us. The people are tolerant, and they are slow to move in matters of importance, but they would annihilate moving-picture production that proved destructive to the little souls entrusted to our keeping just as surely as they are now calling out the best photoplays manufacturers can create. Back of varied and mixed characteristics the whole people have plenty of sane and solid common sense.

The value of motion-pictures as a medium of supplying knowledge in palatable and easily-assimilated form is not a matter of recent discovery on the part of any individual, having been widely recognized for a long time, but I have yet to see or hear any practical and well-defined suggestions on the subject, most writers on the subject dealing in generalities rather than fall into error by offering radical particulars. The plain truth is that the new educational system is now in process of natural and gradual evolution, and it is difficult for any one to say in advance exactly what part the pictures are to play.

History is being taught by all first-class producers. Leading events in the formation of our own nation have often been pictured by the Edison films, with some attention to modern and ancient history in other countries, while biography, tradiation, fiction as expressing human life and epic poems with their stimulus to thought are being utilized in response to public demand. What do the people want? Observe the long line at the box office when a really fine feature play is being exhibited.

Geography? What are we all learning from views of our own mountain ranges, of pineries and lumbering, of our great rivers and lakes, of oyster fisheries, of cotton plantations, of mining, of irrigation, in the varied survey of our physiography? Geography is a study of the earth as the home of man. We are carried by the pictures to Canada, Mexico, Porto Rico, the Philippines, even to Alaska, that we may realize our present and future responsibilities. Then we travel on the screen to other lands that we may broaden our scope by learning how others live.

Elementary science? This most fascinating portion of human knowledge seemes to be slow in finding its way into the movies, but perhaps this is just as it should be. While we may be able to show the intricate and beautiful evolution of plants and flowers or give a glimpse of wild animals and birds in their native haunts, there is such a wide range of topics from which selections can be made and arranged that great care must be taken in working them out.

Supposing that Mr. Edison tells us in picture the story of electricity! Supposing that others portray on the screen scientific methods of extracting and using the metals, the adulteration of foods, the action of bacteria, what constitutes a healthy condition of the body, the evil effects of alcoholism, the elements of sanitary house-construction, the impressive arrangement of the solar system, the value of certain forms of gymnastic exercise, all about the weather, gathering a lot of concrete material about each particular subject, and there are deep and vital relations to be considered, such as heredity, variation, adaptation and environment.

Not to be narrow—this is a many-sided idea—education should not be regarded as merely the imparting or acquisition of knowledge, but should cover moral training and embrace cultivation of manner, sentiment and feeling. It means, in plain words, all that fits the little human being to live rightly and do well in maturity. Moving pictures hold attention because they work on the emotions; they reach a vital spot; they are proven educational factors because they awaken human interest.

Those of us who have "enjoyed"—God save the word—a classical education may count it among our valued possessions as a matter of discipline, but we must acknowledge that what most stimulated us in after life was what most deeply engaged our interest. The problem, therefore, of broad education, of intellectual discipline, attention, observation, memory, constructive and creative imagination, development of will power and right physical growth quite as well as that of moral character, depends first upon cultivating a wholesome interest in what is to be learned.

As to bringing the different studies into relation with one another so as to overcome their present unconnectedness, it may be that the very life of instruction depends upon the thought-stimulating process of correlation, but it would be well in any new system to begin with what is concrete and reach the abstract when we better understand the workings of the mind than we do. I believe in leading children gently to greater heights and grander points of observation, so gently that they will not be wearied on the way but gain strength for superior effort as they rise, giving them plenty of time to work over and assimilate new impressions received during the formative period. It seems to me that one of the first uses of moving pictures in schools would be to stimulate interest in what is to be learned.

I expected to discuss this subject with manager Plimpton at the Edison studio—he is a live wire, reads everything that is written about moving pictures, attends the exhibitions to see what others are doing, and is one of the best posted men in the business—but my attention was entirely diverted by other matters. I had been to the studio often enough to fully realize that he was a man of tremendous activities—the imprint of his capacity for organization is everywhere to be seen in the place—so I went by appointment in response to an invitation to lunch in his private office.

On arrival I was told at the door to saunter in and make myself at home. This may sound easy to those who have never steered through the bewildering tangle of a big studio, but I came near being wrecked like the mariners who tried to pass Scylla and Charybdis, where sirens lured them from the course. There was a siren on the way with expressive eyes and a wondrous smile, a smile worth immortalizing in the pictures, more entrancing than that of the daughter of Herodias who caused John the Baptist to lose his head. It cost me a springtime sigh to pass on to the office.

Mr. Plimpton was not there, but I found him soon after in company with Harry Furniss watching the rehearsal of an interior scene.

"I've seen you before," said the famous caricaturist when we were introduced.

I at first thought this was a chance shot, but it was a true one. His power of seizing upon the salient characteristics of faces had enabled his memory to overleap a period of fourteen years when we met at a Lotus Club dinner. It was interesting to renew acquaintance with an intuitive observer so renowned—his sanguine temperament combined with a habit of intensifying what he has to say makes him a man worth meeting as well as an enjoyable companion at table.

I was pleased to sit vis-a-vis with his daughter at the lunch in Mr. Plimpton's private office, but was not entirely at ease because the artist and the manager, originator and organizer, sat at the ends of the long table, one of naturally keen perceptions and the other a close reasoner very much alive to the thoughts of others, where I was within easy range of vision, but had to turn my head to study either of them. Under the circumstances it was out of the question for me to discuss the educational value of moving pictures as I have at the beginning of this article, so I contented myself with the offhand notes of an impressionist.

I could not ascertain what Mr. Furniss is to do for the Edison Company—that is probably a trade secret—but I imagine that his performance will be of interest. Besides being genial and witty in company, it was plain to me that he was a great idealist.

Physically, Furniss is a decided contrast to Plimpton. The latter has a thin face of self-repression and self-control, while the rotund artist carries unmistakable signs of enjoying abundantly what are usualy termed the good things of life. The manager also looks careworn through his well-disposed amiability, shows signs of anxious responsibility combined with grim determination to overcome all obstacles on the way to complete success, while the artist is more of a dreamer, shows the effect of his imaginative treatment of subjects—he possibly depicts imperfect elements in a human face by way of elimination in striving after ideal beauty.

I may be wrong—these are only fleeting impressions—but I am more sure when adjudging the appropriateness of moving picture settings, and when my attention was turned from men to things by the examination of an album of still pictures in Mr. Plimpton's office I volunteered the opinion that Edison exteriors and interiors showed decided improvement recently, especially in releases of romantic drama like "The Three Musketeers."

Look at the outdoor scene where the Courtier is bowing to the lady. Here is an ideal exterior. Why? In what respect is it remarkable? This is supposed to be a French court like that of Versailles, and one of the most difficult settings to obtain in our country, yet it is as near perfect as one could obtain abroad, with modern structures in evidence. The effect on the screen is one of mingled surprise and delight. The entire sentiment of the situation is flashd upon the imagination by a beauty that is quite as much felt as seen. But for the building in the upper left corner this would be a masterpiece of delusion.

More perfect is the picture showing the queen and her ladies. Here is an interior rich in setting, costume and posture. The height of art in a photoplay of this kind is to persuade you that you are in the presence of reality. Here are persons borrowed from the phantoms of the past, whether those of romance or history, that become suddenly animated before your eyes, endowed with passions and emotions, real women as they might well have been, but the entire effect would be lost amid inappropriate settings. As it is they are set forth by an art that is never conspicuous. It truly remains in the background, yet this is an essential part of the whole art which transports us to regions where we lose sight of ourselves, the art in this case of the photodrama.

The settings and backgrounds are made possible by the selective taste of a new man in the Edison studio, Mr. Charles J. Brabin. He is a modest sort of a chap, direct and unassuming as a thoroughbred American, though an Englishman by birth. It is a pleasure to compliment him not only upon his superior performance in recent plays but in the promise shown in his work of better things to come. He is as progressive as the manager who found him, and who is bringing the Edison product up steadily in quality by the hardest kind of careful and consistent work.

The opportunities of the Edison studio are those of moving picture production, and they appear to be unlimited from the present point of view. It is a charming business in the abstract, not only entertaining and educational, but broadly humanizing in making us better acquainted with the world we live in and with one another.

PICTURE PROGRAM CONTEST IN TOPEKA, KAN.

The Commercial Club of Topeka will be the donors of a loving cup to the winner of a very unique and commendable contest among the photoplay theaters of that city. The prize will be given to the theater that presents the best program on a certain day or evening designated by the committee. The judges will be the picture fans themselves, each ticket entitling the buyer to a vote. All of the picture houses in the city are entered in the contest, both Licensed and Independent.

BREAKING RECORDS.

Great Northern Special Feature Film Co. Makes a Rapid Growth.

Charley Abrams, at the head of the Great Northern Special Feature Film Co., claims to have set a new mark in the feature film business and moreover he submits the proofs to back up his statement. In the short time the concern has been operating nearly all the territory in the United States has been assigned with the slogan "No state rights hold-up," and he has secured energetic hustlers to handle the product. To add to this feat the business has grown so rapidly that the office force has been doubled, and it has been necessary to secure larger and more convenient quarters at 42 East 14th Street, where an entire floor is utilized. With the establishment of a publicity department the company is now thoroughly equipped to maintain its claim of being one of the largest feature film distributors in the world.

"A Victim of the Mormons," the first subject to be distributed, has proven a record-breaker wherever it has been exhibited, and Mr. Abrams is in receipt of many letters and telegrams lauding the film and its ability to fill theaters. This subject is perhaps the most widely advertised of any feature ever offered.

"The Nihilist's Conspiracy" is dividing the honors with the initial picture, proving popular with the exhibitor and showing to standing room in many theaters, while "The Call of a Woman," just distributed, promises to duplicate the drawing powers of the two subjects mentioned.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT.

Waldron is Iceless.

OUR friend Harry G. Waldron, of the Langdon and Electric theaters, Langdon, N. D., has been having trouble with the school tickets and he writes so briskly that we are letting him tell it in his own entertaining fashion. He says:

> Some time ago I noticed the report of an exhibitor who gave tickets to a near-by school and required an adult admission with the ticket. The scheme looked good to me and I tried it. I had two tickets printed, one admitting a child, when accompanied by an adult paid admission, and another, admitting child bearer and friend, under same restriction. First was issued monthly to all pupils with perfect attendance. The second, apportioned to the different rooms of our local high and grade school, about one ticket to every 7 or 8 pupils, or a reward for good conduct and high scholarship.
> Now for the trouble. The first Friday night (the only night the principal would let them come) came around. The first man in presented an adult 15 cent ticket and stood sponsor for 12 kids holding 6 tickets. They were accompanied by an "adult paid admission" all right! One for the entire bunch! I explained it and allowed it to pass that time. The next two kids came alone and had one ticket. I sent them back to get a dime. A few minutes later their dad, one of my old "regulars" came back and wanted to fight, almost. After trying the scheme four weeks, I have given it up.

Free Tickets Work Better.

> I am now issuing 50 tickets absolutely free every week, as I have the room on Friday night and don't believe it hurts the gross. In addition, it makes me solid with all, where before they thought I was grafting. If they kick on the free tickets, the only thing to do is to pay them to come. I don't think it pays to refuse admission to anyone, and I couldn't make them comply with the condition, so I had to give it up. The boys bothered me so on Friday nights that I had to chase them from the front and I kicked one particularly "sassy" kid. It happened to be a boy who had fractured his ribs about four weeks previous to that by slipping against the pump at home. The following day I met his father, who told me he was going to have me sued for $2,000 damages for kicking his boy in the ribs and breaking them. I argued with him and finally slapped his face. When he insisted on it the next time we met, I kicked him and punched his jaw. He happens to be the city ice man and the alderman of the First Ward. Now I will have to go without ice this summer and he will also have something to say when my license comes up for discussion next month. Now this is an awful tale of woe, but it's true. The free tickets are working fine.
> I find lots of ideas in your columns and wish to compliment you for the fine work you are doing.
> Wish you could give me a few pointers on my situation. Can't afford to issue a pretentious program three times each week, and can't get advance booking on my service. Use A1 stuff but undated. Have to depend on dodger, etc. Use screen freely. Am thinking of issuing a little folder of film gossip, without advance information and distributing freely. Have files of World, Telegraph, various bulletins, etc., from which to glean information likely to be interesting to the fans. What do you think?

Where the Hitch Comes.

The form ticket suggested in this department, from which Mr. Waldron took the idea, stipulated that the holder must be accompanied by an adult as required by the city ordinance, which is in effect in most places. It would seem that he used the idea without stopping to realize that there was no ordinance to back him up, and then gave out too many tickets. Others have reported the successful adoption of the idea. The scheme loses force when the distribution is so freely made that it becomes common and ceases to be a real prize. From two to five tickets for each room, according to the size of the class, is plenty. Where there is no ordinance against the admission of children unaccompanied, the restriction should be waived and we think that Mr. Waldron will find that the scheme will work well now. And we hope he does not have to go without ice.

Where service for the week is not known in advance it is best to use dodgers for each change of bill, getting the paper out as soon as the reels come to town. We do not favor the weekly news sheet without program because we do not believe that it will have grip enough to bring back the money spent for it. A four or eight page sheet with only one program or none at all will lack direct interest. We think that Mr. Waldron will get better return from the leaflets he occasionally issues than from a general program and that the dodger will give wider publicity. He uses a good form of sheet, a colored slip about four inches wide and from eight to ten long, according to the matter, and runs all titles, playing up one particular reel as a feature with the story of a vivid description. It is more intelligent advertising than a program without programs would be, but we would suggest that he date all paper instead of merely announcing "Tonight" or "Thursday." There is something definite about a date in connection with the big "Tonight" that carries conviction and possibly avoids dispute when a belated bill gets in with new stock or lays about the house a couple of days.

The Leaflets.

We have alluded to one of Mr. Waldron's leaflets and he sends a four page folder with pages 3 x 6 inches on Motion Pictures as an Aid to Moden Education, that should be useful in backing up the distribution of school tickets. We quote extracts, regretting that we cannot give space in full:

> To you, as a thoughtful person, realizing the necessity of amusement for the child and the greater necessity of analyzing the influence of the amusement for good or bad, we offer the following suggestions in regard to the functions of the moving picture as an aid to modern education:
> Modern education first focuses the ATTENTION of the child, then demands that its INTEREST shall be engaged; third, aims to develop individual THOUGHT and EXPRESSION; fourth, promotes the fruitage of the training in PRODUCTION; fifth, distributes PURE IDEALS.
> It demonstrates that the avenue to progress and success is through RIGHT THINKING and RIGHT DOING.
> The lesson of success through right thinking and right doing is taught by the invariable downfall of wrong and the triumph of right.
> We do not wish to be misunderstood. Our theater is not a charitable institution, a theological seminary, nor a kindergarden, but a profit seeking amusement enterprise. We do claim, however, that we exercise an influence for good while we entertain.
> It is with this end in view that we propose to designate Friday evening as "Children's Night" and announce that the selection of films for Thursday and Friday will contain pictures of especial interest to the children, together with the usual variety.
> We are co-operating with the superintendent of schools to give the pupils of the grades an opportunity to attend free, as a reward for good conduct, high standing, etc.
> For the benefit of grown ups, we might mention here that we will continue to exhibit the current issue of "Pathe's Weekly" every Tuesday and Wednesday, also that Saturday and Monday nights will be given over to the more popular films.

But Back It Up.

Taken in connection with the distribution of tickets, of which every child in town is probably talking, such an intimate chat has real value, but we are sorry that it was not backed up. It's pretty hard sometimes to hold one's temper when a swarm of small boys infest the front of the house, but it pays to dodge down cellar and work off surplus steam chasing the rats instead of chasing the boys away.

Here's a Good Line.

Here's a good line we have borrowed from the program of the Surprise Theater, South Bend, Indiana. It asks: "Do you enjoy our Sunday shows? Ever think how many good ones you missed during the week?" There is a "yank" to a suggestion like that. It gets the man who only comes Sundays into the habit of dropping in through the week and makes the "Sunday regular" into a full fledged fan. The single meaty line is worth a page of ponderous argument. Try it in your program.

A One-Page Daily.

Edmund Reid, of the Palace Theater, Milledgeville, Ga., sends in some samples of a daily paper which he uses in place of the customary circular and adds that it costs him $1.50 a day and that he finds it the best advertising medium he has ever used. It is printed on cheap colored stock 15 inches wide by nine deep and on one side of the paper only. It is roughly in newspaper form with "ears" for the weather report and the cotton market on either side of the heading. It is six thirteen-em columns wide and carries not a little live news in addition to some outside advertising at times, the booming for the films and the daily program. Both local and wire news are used and we can understand the value of such a sheet in a small town. The form is awkward and we think that were it folded to get it down to better proportions it would be possible to obtain sufficient advertising to make it a four-page sheet with not a little influence in the community. The handling of the news features argues editorial experience somewhere along the line and a really newsy sheet could be worked up that would be as good a medium for the local merchants as it has been for the theater. Questions of cost must be closely figured in picture theaters, but we think that Mr. Reid could make money on the issue if he hustled some advertising, provided that he kept the same proportion of live stuff to carry his readers.

Want's Three Reels.

Carey Wilson, of the Criterion Theater, Rutherford, N. J., writes:

"Had John Bunny out here on the 13th (we defy superstition), and he nearly caused a riot in the northern part of New Jersey surrounding Rutherford. Turned away fully three thousand people. Street was blocked for a hundred feet on each side of the theater. Played to just as many people as we could jam into the theater. Simply a riot in every way.

Are going to play Costello here on the 9th of April and Lillian Walker some little time later. Enclose a few samples of Bunny advertising and some others. Use the handbills almost exclusively for advertising as I have found it worth a dozen newspaper ads. Have a scheme where we have one of our handbills enclosed in every Sunday morning paper delivered in the vicinity and that means eight towns. Still running vaudeville (Cries of "Curse It" from without) and expect to keep it up. People like it and demand it as long as we give them the right kind of stuff, which is not the regular "Pictureshow" kind. Can get all the space in the newspapers that I want. Find it hard work to get hold of enough press dope on the films and certainly think Vitagraph have the right idea in publishing those little articles with blanks for the name and date. Find Vitagraphs very popular here so am running a Vitagraph Day Wednesday. Going to give out souvenir postals of Bunny and Costello which, of course, will bear the advertisement of Costello night on them. Still hollering for extra reel features. Could use a two or three reel feature at least every week if I could get it.

Make Your Own Features.

We are trying to educate Mr. Wilson up to the fact that some of the regular releases can be made into features with a little good handling. We alluded to his plaint recently in connection with the Edison How Moving Pictures are Made and Shown, a subject which is vitally interesting to every photoplay patron yet which was released as a regular and because there was no extra charge for it was accepted as such. It could be taken where it has not yet been shown and boomed for a week ahead. Much the some thing can be done with the same company's Charlie's Reform, which was produced in co-operation with the Russell Sage Foundation. It is a part of the propaganda series and points out the good that comes from recreation centres where the boys are taken from the streets and taught to play healthful games instead of craps. It is the sort of thing that every minister, school teacher and welfare worker can be made interested in and the outside booming would be worth more than all the newspaper space a theater could afford. This will be released April 5th and shortly following are The Spanish Cavalier, based on the well-known song done in Bermuda; an Unusual Sacrifice, which makes Telepathy its theme, and Winter Logging in Maine which is a particularly effective industrial of unusual photographic quality.

Along the same lines are the Vitagraph's The Seventh Son, written by Hal Reid and introducing one of Ralph Ince's impersonations of President Lincoln; Before Books Were Made, a story of prehistoric man, and the recent Cardinal Woolsey, while Kalem offers a semi-historical romance in the Spanish Revolt of 1836, written by Capt. Charles Kiener. There are others of equal interest scheduled for early release.

It's Easy To Do.

If you arrange a head for your program it is easy to boom any worth while film into a feature and if you are careful to pick out only the stuff that will make good for you, you don't need the special priced feature stuff. Half of the stars of the dramatic stage are hand-made. They have profited by being boomed and their actual work is no better than that of other players, but the public has been made to believe that they are stars and has taken the press agent's word for it. Commence advertising as soon as you know that the reel is coming out and get the reel as soon as possible after it is issued that some other house may not profit by your advertising. If it has to do with propaganda, go to those who are likely to be interested and talk it up to them. If it is the visualization of some well-known literary work go after the literary societies and talk it up there. Make it big and it will seem important, but if you regard it merely as a part of your daily program the audience will follow your example. If you know ahead what you are going to have you can have a daily feature and a weekly star and at only the extra cost of a dated service. A certain well known faunal naturalist who just now has gone gunning for bigger game, never would have been a candidate for a third term nomination if he had worn rubber heels on his boots. It's all a matter of press work from the presidency to the photoplay. Be a press agent.

Splendid Work.

Alan J. Bachrach, of the Pastime Amusement Company, Washington, has been doing splendid work for the pictures generally in his educational campaign at the Pastime Theater. Every Saturday morning the children are given a lecture on some educational subject and prizes are given the following week for the best composition on the subject of the week before. Perhaps report would be a better word since the children are not encouraged to crib from the encyclopedia but are rewarded for the best report of the lecture itself as a test of memory and assimilation. In Washington it is easy to obtain the co-operation of notable lectures without great trouble or expense, but on a smaller scale the same thing may be done in the smallest town and the smaller the place the more helpful will be the result in proving the real value of the once despised photoplays. Mr. Bachrach writes that educators and others are taking the matter up and that the spread of the idea throughout the city is probable.

Just in passing, the announcements of these features are carried as live reading matter by all the daily papers. If you are not interested in the movement think this last line over at any rate.

Here is part of one of the items. It is about half of the space given:

One hundred and fifty children were enlisted to-day in a campaign to "swat the fly early," following two lectures given at the Pastime Theater, 475 Pennsylvania avenue northwest, telling of the menace of the little insect. E. P. Cowell of the Franklin Institute of Philadelphia, who is the lecturer of the free educational course which is being conducted by the theater, was the first speaker. The second was Richard B. Watrous, secretary of the American Civic Association. Pictures were shown depicting the fly in his work of carrying germs; also several cartoons depicting the arrival of the fly family for the summer visit.

Both Mr. Cowell and Mr. Watrons urged the children to see that their back yards and houses were clean in every nook and corner, so that no lurking fly would be left to start a colony.

Following the lectures on flies, motion pictures were shown depicting incidents in American revolution. These elicited great applause from the children, especially the last showing a picture of George Washington. Another film showing Arabs in their native land. Arab children in school, snake charmers and fortune tellers were some of the scenes in this film.

The winners of the essay contest were Walter S. Smoot, Joseph Naiman and Marie Edelen. Another lecture will be given next Saturday morning at 11 o'clock.

INQUIRIES

S. H. M.—Phillips Smalley and Miss Lois Weber had the leads in Rex's "Angels Unawares." First question will be answered next week. You should have your paper by now.

J. A. M.—The present studio management of the Powers Company is unable to obtain the information you desire, although every effort has been made. It is only since Giles R. Warren and Albert McGovern have taken hold that the directing end has been run in businesslike fashion and this question antedates their appearance. George Ober was the Miser in Thanhouser's "His Great Uncle's Spirit." Miss Julia Stuart was the wife who was subject to heart attacks in Lubin's "Through Jealous Eyes." She is now with the Eclair Company. James Cooley was Henry Walthall's rival in Reliance's "The Best Man Wins." Rex does not answer—as usual. We are not able to locate the Gaumont film, but think it was December, 1910.

C. M.—The principals in Majestic's "Next!" were Miss Mabel Trunelle, as the manicurist; Herbert Prior, as the barber and George L. Tucker as the successful suitor.

M. J. R.—The report that a Biograph star was killed in an automobile smash has been current for the last six or eight months. Sometimes it is supposed to be Miss Marion Leonard, sometimes Miss Pickford and Miss Florence Lawrence has been in the auto a couple of times, but it is a purely imaginary auto in a purely imaginary wreck. After this don't listen to the tales of death you will hear around the picture shows unless you see it in this paper.

FLICKER.—We cannot give you definite addresses for the companies you name, but would suggest that you address them in care of the National Film Distributing Company.

RAE S.—Robert J. Vignola played Feeney in Kalem's "Arrah na Pogue." Sydney Olcott was Shaun. Miss Marion Cooper was Jessie in the same company's "The Battle of Pottsburg Bridge." Miss Betty Harte was the stowaway in Selig's "The Little Stowaway." Miss Marguerite Snow and James Cruze were She and Leo in Thanhouser's "She."

NO NAME.—Next time send your name. Joseph Graybill was the sick husband in Thanhouser's "For Sale, a Life." William Russell played the title part in "Lochinvar." James Richardson was the man in the picture sent. We think you have more time than we have to look up the title of that Selig in Stories of the Films.

E. G. J.—The western section of the Essanay Company is in San Rafael, Cal.

J. C.—There is no such thing in existence as a complete list of titles of motion pictures "from the beginning of the moving picture business." There is not even a complete list of recent releases in bulk, but the indices to the various volumes of the Moving Picture World will give you this information by six months save for the last three volumes which, owing to the increasing size of the publication, run but three months each.

W. D. F.—We are unable to recall a film of Hazel Kirke. If any exchange has a copy of the print will it kindly advise us. One in the New England States is preferred.

F. H. H.—It was a foolish thing to submit a comedy scenario to a company making two-reel Indian stories. Address the scenario editor, Richard V. Spencer, with courtesy, and we are sure that he will look it up.

M. G. L. H.—There were several men in Lubin's "A College Girl," but we presume that the inquiry has reference to Arthur Johnson, who has the lead. "The leading lady in the Lubin now," seems to mean Miss May Buckley. We courteously but firmly pass up your second question and submit that "The young lady's name in the Vitagraph her picture is in the Moving Picture World in the right-hand corner," is not a question at all. The right hand corner of what page and what issue of the hundred-page paper? If you mean the frame used in the Vitagraph advertisement, the lady in the lower right hand corner is Miss Helen Gardner. Please be more definite next time.

JACK K. C.—Send to our publisher for a copy of Technique of the Photoplay (paper, $1), or send a stamped and addressed envelope to the Lubin or Melies companies for a free sheet of suggestions. We do not recommend schools because we do not believe that the real art of scenario writing can be taught by lesson. If you have it in you you merely need to be started right. If it's not in you, you never can learn. Miss Gertrude Robinson was the Girl in Reliance's "The Fur Smugglers." The Thanhouser Kid seems to be about eight or ten years old. Miss Gene Gauntier heads the El Kalems now working in Egypt and the Holy Land.

LUBIN ADMIRER.—Miss Lottie Briscoe was the wife in Lubin's "A Matter of Business." Miss Grace Scott was the wife and Miss Johnson the stenographer in "The Antique Ring." Miss Briscoe was the little milliner in "The Preacher and the Gossips." You say you are making these inquiries to find out who took Miss Lawrence's place. It is officially stated that Miss May Buckley (who is none of those you mention), has replaced Miss Lawrence.

E. R. C.—Glad to hear from you again. The Yankee is now the Comet Film Co., 145 West 45th street. You might address them relative to the best scenario. There is no objection to a nom de plume, but it is apt to complicate matters when releases are to be signed or checks endorsed. We do not believe that any studio selects scripts written by men solely because they are written by men. The acceptance of the initialed scenario was merely a chance but if you think the women are getting the worst of it stick to the initials and give up the George Elliot stunt. As to pronunciations: It is Pa-tay Fray-ers, Gau-moo, Cin-es and se-near–io. The "moo" in Gaumont is not as in "cow" but more like a cough. It cannot be done with cold type. It takes a Frenchman. In Cines, the Kleine advertisement gives it "Sin-ees" and not "Signs" or "Kines."

M. D. LaV.—Miss Hazel Neason was Agnes Bonner in Vitagraph's "Birds of a Feather."

A. R. S.—Arthur Johnson was the minister in Lubin's "The Preacher and the Gossips."

NO NAME.—Eleanor Kahn was the wife in Essanay's "The Clown's Baby." In Essanay's "A Record Romance" Helen Weston was the new stenographer. We do not place the characters you mention in "Out of the Depths." Give their names if you can. In Lubin's "An Antique Ring," Howard Mitchell was the secretary and Miss Johnson was the stenographer. We do not know who the older man in the first scene was because we did not see the picture. In Lubin's "The Crompromise," Robert Burns was the husband and Miss Elsie Glynn was the wife. There were ten or a dozen servants. Which one do you mean? Your other questions are too vague. If you will give the name of the character we can tell you but we cannot identify girls with headbands even if they are in the center of the picture.

Richard Roe—As a rule the picture is made before the release date is assigned. We cannot give biographical sketches. We have no line on Miss Briscoe in that particular release, but she was with the company at the time.

The SCENARIO WRITER

CONDUCTED BY EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

If you want copyright, get busy.

THE attention of every scenario writer, no matter what his present attitude toward the copyrighting of scenarios, is directed to the new bill presented in the House of Representatives by Edward W. Townsend and known as H. R. 22,350. This supersedes the previous Townsend bill and also includes the more recent Moon bill, but with this important change:

Instead of providing for the copyrighting of scenarios in class D (dramatic and musico-dramatic works), it specifically provides that they shall not be so received.

The Moon bill provides for class D "dramatic or dramatico-musical compositions or motion picture photoplays."

H. R. Bill 22,350 substitutes for this: "Dramatic or dramatico-musical compositions (not to include mere scenarios)."

Every scenario writer should write or telegraph his Representative in Congress protesting against the passage of the bill until this line is changed. At the present time Mr. Thorvald Solberg, Register of Copyrights, accepts for registration any photoplay in standard form which complies with the requirement that a producer may, without alteration or addition, make a complete dramatic production from the script, which difference, it has been contended by this writer, constitutes the difference between the "scenario," or sketch of a dramatic composition and the "photoplay," which is a distinct form of dramatic writing.

Write or wire your congressman and do it now. The fact that certain interests have sought to abolish the copyright privilege for photoplays seems a rather good reason why this privilege should not be withdrawn but maintained.

Close to the Limit.

We print the following from the Manuscript Department of the Kalem Company because we think it is about as close to their limit for stupidity as we have yet come. The editor writes:

> We believe an account of the following incident will prove of interest to your readers:
> Under date of February 13th, 1912, we received from E. Haydon Bozel, Fredericksburg, Va., a manuscript entitled "Cherubim Chimes." His envelope bore a two-cent postage due stamp and no postage was enclosed for return of the manuscript.
> As the subject was found unavailable for our purposes, we notified Mr. Bozel on the same date—February 13th, 1912—and asked that he forward the necessary postage if he wished the manuscript returned. This manuscript was properly filed and the customary notation made in our records.
> To-day, March 22nd, we are in receipt of a communication from a New York City attorney, stating Mr. Bozel has placed with him for collection an account of $20 against the Kalem Company "for furnishing us with a moving picture story."
> We have explained the situation to the attorney, with the recommendation that he instruct Mr. Bozel to send us the postage for a return of his manuscript.

For downright asinine, damfool stupidity we contend this is not to be beaten. A script comes in overdue without return envelope or return postage, and when the company courteously advises the author that if his story is worth the return postage to him he can have it back he wants to collect $20. He doesn't even wait for a reasonable interval to elapse; granting that he did not receive the Kalem letter and he does not first make inquiry of the company. He simply puts the bill for his own valuation in the hands of the collector.

We have had letters from many scenario writers who regret the very evident tendency on the part of some companies to use the work of certain authors instead of buying from the open market. This seems to be the answer. Of course this is an exceptional case, but there is not a week, indeed scarcely a day, that the studios do not receive impertinent letters from fools who think themselves authors and who, in their blind stupidity, spoil not alone their own small chances, but who destroy the market for those better qualified writers who, in time, might gain success.

The Kalem editorial staff is particularly well organized and we have yet to hear a complaint from authors concerning the editorial room. On the contrary, we have heard many compliments paid the Kalem editor. This sort of action seems to be absolutely uncalled for.

A man who doesn't know enough to send return postage should not try to write and for the sake of those beginners who play the game fairly it is to be regretted that something cannot be done to check the horde of ignorant who try the patience of editors beyond the breaking point. They are rapidly closing the market and you can't blame the editors.

Changed Conditions at Powers'.

We have received numerous complaints that scripts sent the Powers Company did not receive the courteous treatment to which they were entitled, and one complaint seemed so well founded that we suggested that the complainant, Guy T. Evans, of Pittsburg, write the present editor, Giles R. Warren, regarding a transgression committed before Mr. Warren took charge. It was not a matter that directly concerned Mr. Warren, since it very considerably antedated his appearance on the scene, but with his usual courtesy he took the matter in hand and made satisfactory arrangement with Mr. Evans. As we have had occasion to say before, Mr. Warren is one of the best type of editors and if you have had trouble with previous Powers' editors it might be well to note that there has been a change very much for the better. In passing it might be well to remind those who are watching the Powers trade mark that the productions made from the Warren scripts by Director Albert McGovern have just commenced to come through and these should not be confounded with the previous output still being released.

The Powers Company offers a limited market since they have staff writers, but even if you cannot sell them it is pleasant to know that there is a real white man at the desk.

No Receipts from Lubin.

The Lubin Manufacturing Company has followed the Edison Company's lead and will not acknowledge receipt of scenarios. It is probable that the few remaining companies going to this trouble will follow suit. As we have said before, we see no reason why a receipt should be sent. It is not the custom in other lines of literary work, and if you desire a receipt it is a simple matter to enclose a postal card with the request that it be mailed back to you. We would suggest this form, the face of the card being self-addressed:

> It is courteously requested that this card be put in the mail on receipt of this manuscript that its safe arrival may be known to the writer. It is understood that this is in no sense a receipt and that, while due care will be exercised in handling the script, submission is made at the author's risk.
> Your script (here fill in the title) > has been received by the........(fill in name)........Company and > will be acted upon as promptly as convenient.
> Please fill in date......................

These cards may be typed in leisure moments and filled in as the case requires.

It is the unwritten law that the author takes the risks and that the company is not responsible. Meet the situation clearly in your card, and use a postal instead of a letter form, since it merely means dating and dropping in the mail box.

Our Prize Contest.

Here's another contribution from a man who thinks that all editors must be fools because they keep on putting out cheap stuff while they ignore his scripts. He writes:

> Right in the beginning class me with the kickers. Like most of the scenario writers, I have managed to slip an occasional script over on some unsuspecting company, during the temporary absence of the office boy, or while the typist was out to lunch.
> But what I want to remark about, is the same old thing, namely, the rejection of scenarios. It has been my experience that the licensed firms are not as good a market for original stories as the independent ones, and am frank to say that there are two or three of the latter that get first crack at all their kind of plays that I write.
> At the bottom of this page I am going to give you a few lines of the synopsis of a play that I sent one of the leading licensed houses, and it was returned with the comment that they wanted only original plots. It is needless to say that the same firm keeps putting out two or three reels a week of the same old worn-out stuff.
> About receiving more for scripts, I, for one, am unwilling to accept less for those I write, and let them use the money to secure intelligent readers.
> SYPNOSIS.—The daughter of a rancher, who objects to the construction of a power and telegraph line across his land, falls in love with the young engineer who has charge of the work. The ranchers plan to chop down the poles, and the daughter rides, at night, down the railroad track on a motorcycle to warn her lover of the attempt. He rushes workmen on a special train to the place in time to prevent the destruction of the line.
> The girl's mother falls sick. The doctor finds that she must have a certain kind of medicine in an hour. The girl tells her lover. He climbs a pole, connects a telegraph instrument, gets the medicine sent out on a train leaving town, catches it as the express messenger throws it to him, and saves the woman's life.

It's the same old kick, but this is the first time that an "Exhibit A" has been offered, and just to prove the point to this correspondent and others in this class, we make this offer:

We will give a copy of Technique of the Photoplay, a six months' subscription to the Moving Picture World, or a year's subscription to the Motion Picture Story Magazine (at the option of the winner) to the person who before May first submits the longest list of duplication of incidents made from this synopsis.

To explain. The incident of cutting in on the telegraph line was used in Thanhouser's "The Train Dispatcher." The handcar or motorcycle as a means of giving warning has been used a score of times and counts each time, but the handcar as a vehicle for elopers as recently used by Lubin and Vitagraph will not count.

The only rule is that the title must not be given and must be that of a film released since May 1st, 1911. Give the title and maker's name if you can, but the maker's name is not essential.

This offer is made not because we want to "show up" this particular correspondent, but because we want to prove to a great army of kickers that the idea they suppose to be new may have been used a half dozen times.

In the event of a tie, precedence will count, the time being taken from the postmark.

Why Waste Money?

The other day we saw a script in which a shoe store and a candy store were called for in a half-reel comedy. Entirely apart from the fact that neither was essential to the story, there was the cost of making these sets without the slightest return in effectiveness.

Manufacturers are generous in spending money for special settings where these will add to the value of the story, but some writers seem to have a passion for writing in special settings with the idea that the luxuriousness of the setting enhances the value of the idea. If the settings called for are in stock or can be made from stock stuff, this is all right, but when a setting is called for that requires special painting and the procuring of elaborate properties, there must be some return made in comedy or dramatic value.

If a comedy is laid about an aching tooth and several of the scenes are laid in the office of a dentist, the producer, if he likes the story, will rent the dental chair and other furnishings, because he will be repaid in the effect, but if a minor scene is laid in a dentist's operating room "to make it more effective" when the same result might perhaps be had from a street scene played in front of the dentist's office, the story will either be changed or thrown out as impractical.

In planning your scene, ask yourself first if the setting out of the ordinary is absolutely essential to the story. If it is, then continue the inquiry to make certain that the results will overbalance the cost. If you can't get more out of the scene than the setting will cost, write the story in another way.

If a man goes into the jeweler's shop to buy an engagement ring, it may serve the purpose as well if he is seen coming out of a jeweler's with the ring in his hand. He puts it back into its box and goes off up the street to give it to the girl. But if in the shop he meets the pretty clerk who breaks up the engagement and if later the fiancee and the clerk come face to face, then the director will not object to the trouble and expense involved in making a set that looks like a jewelry store. Don't put these scenes in "to make it effective," but if you can give a return in value, then go ahead. Nine times out of ten you'll find that it can be done just as well in some other and less expensive fashion.

Sometimes It Pays.

Sometimes it pays to be independent. Witness this letter from Harry Lee, of Chicago:

> Some time ago I sent an original scenario to one of the big film companies. About a month later they sent me a letter and affidavit offering me fifteen dollars for the scenario. I sent the affidavit back and advised them I would not go to all that trouble for fifteen dollars. They returned the scenario.
> I sent it to another concern and several weeks later they sent me a check for $35.
> Now here's the point. How can one concern have the nerve to offer fifteen dollars for a fifty dollar scenario and then demand an affidavit, when another concern is glad to pay more than double and assume the risk itself?

Personally, we think that the film companies would find more ample protection in the voucher check system than in the affidavit, and at best we think it almost indecent to ask a man to swear that his fifteen-dollar idea is original. For ourselves, we would not sign an affidavit for less than thirty-five dollars, and not begin to give trading stamps short of the fifty dollar mark.

But here's the point. Don't slap your stuff out haphazard. Send your stuff over the route and find your best market. Have a selling plan and let the selling plan aim to develop the best market for your own work. Don't take the other man's word. We've had two letters in the same mail, one telling of the small payment offered by a stated concern and the other rejoicing in the fact that the very same company has raised the price another five or ten dollars. More than that, we've been advised that a certain company had stopped buying and found that it was because they were buying from another correspondent.

It is the same way in the short story end and every other branch of the literary market. There is no set rule. Most editors pay what they think a story is worth and the point to be aimed at is to find the men who think the most of the style of story you produce. The Blank company may send you fifteen while the Dash Manufacturing Co. will give you fifty. Another man writing the same grade of scripts may find conditions reversed. It's your business to find out the companies that will pay best for your work and send them your best, unloading the rejections and the second grade of your product on the smaller pay.

Make out your list and study the style each company prefers. Decide which company comes closest to your style of product and then send them all of your best work. If you make a sale and the price is right, keep on. If the price is too small, query the editor politely as to the chance of getting more for your work. If he holds out no hope, drop him down the list and go to the second name. In time, if you run close to form on your stories, you'll have a regular route over which to send your stuff in a descending scale of payments for your particular sort of stuff. Script selling is a business. Be busniess-like. The author who makes money has his lines laid. When he has written a story he makes out a list of the most probable markets in the order of their advantages and sends the story down the list. The list may not be the same for all scripts and it may not be the same as that his confrere may select, but it is based on his knowledge of the rate of payments the various companies will make him—and that's what he's interested in.

Concentrate your initial efforts on a few concerns and broaden your lists as the second and third trials develop promise. One-half the secret of success lies in writing salable stuff and the other half in selling it to the best advantage and just where you can sell to the best advantage is something that no one can tell you. It is purely a matter of individual experiment and personal knowledge.

"Use No Hooks."

Here is a letter from a Chicago correspondent who wants to join the club and who pays his membership fee in advance. We would point out that long since we advocated the use of a blank sheet front and back as a protection to the script. Here is the letter:

> Kindly enroll me as life member of your "Use No Hooks" club. My qualifications for membership are as follows: I have learned that Pathe pencils a number on the first page of submitted scrips, and Selig on the back. Edison sometimes writes the date on the first page, but this is usually successfully erased before return to the author. To eliminate this nuisance without "getting in wrong" I attach a slip of paper to the top of the MSS. (in the case of Selig, to the back), with the following note: "Please use this slip for memoranda to avoid recopying of MSS. Thank you!"
> When I first began to write scenarios last December, I used the large size paper and double spaced the work. I found that my scripts never ran over three pages, which, if I used a large envelope, failed to go through the mails without crumpling, and if I used an ordinary business envelope, the creases in the paper made it rather difficult to handle. So I had the paper cut in half and use it that way, single spacing with double spacing between scenes, etc. I find that my scripts come back to me in good shape, if the studios are careful, which the majority of them are.
> Here is a motto for the "Use No Hooks" Club:
> "I hate to be a kicker;
> For it does not make for peace,
> But the wheel that does the squeaking
> Is the wheel that gets the grease."

The correspondent uses a sheet 8½ x 5½ inches, but writes across the short way instead of the long way as most do who use this cut. In our own practice we find a 20-pound bond paper and a heavy manila envelope, the paper being the usual 8½ by 11 will travel well and look better. With a front and back sheet it just comes inside the ounce limit for a three-page script.

SELIG POLYSCOPE CO. TO RELEASE FORMER SUCCESS.

Ever since The Selig Polyscope Co. released their production of "The Devil, the Servant and the Man," back in 1910, they have received request upon request to reproduce same. Recently, Mr. Beal, who directed the first production, rejoined the Selig staff of producers, and the first thing he did after entering upon his duties was to produce "The Devil, the Servant and the Man." The new production promises to be vastly superior to the former one.

INDEPENDENTS VISIT AMERICAN FILM MFG. CO.

The office of the American Film Mfg. Co. was the scene of much visiting by the Independent clans who held forth at the Hotel Sherman on Saturday. Many planned to visit the new factory and studios of the American, but the prolonged sessions prevented.

"THE KIDNAPPED CONDUCTOR" (Kalem), March 27.—A fine bunch of pretty cowgirls, who ride very well, is what makes this picture go. It has also a comic situation and affords a good many laughs. There is one incident in it at which no one laughed. This shows two office girls, in their hurry to get a car, knocking down a man on a flight of steps. The girls lose the car, because the conductor is fresh and wanted to have a laugh. They also lose their jobs and get the cowgirls to duck the conductor. The spectators laughed at some bits of good acting and at such business in it as really burlesques human life, not at its rough business. It seemed to be popular.

"HIS MOTHER'S SHROUD" (Vitagraph), March 26.—A haunting picture of Russian peasants; it deals with terrible things—degradation, poverty and crime—realistically and truthfully (for the most part). It has, however, a vitality that stimulates intellectually, if not morally, but it is very gloomy. We saw it on Broadway with the crowd going home from a day's work (6 p. m.) and, while we admired it, we agreed with one spectator who told us that it wasn't worth a continental as a show. We also saw it the first thing next morning on Union Square and were enthusiastic; the whole house seemed to be. It must have been written by some one who knew conditions in Russia and must have been produced by some one who, at least, had made a careful study of them. As a story, it certainly would have dragged through the middle half, had it not been for the glorious acting of Mrs. Maurice as the ragged, despairing, starving mother of the son who is in the army and proves himself a thief and murderer. If there is something in it depressing, there is also something magnificent. If we lived under such conditions, we fear we wouldn't show up as big as this old mother does, nor, perhaps, even as her brutal offspring. It is a big, strong picture, a fine offering for the right audience. It edifies more than entertains.

"PERCIVAL CHUBS AND THE WIDOW" (Edison), March 27.—A farce comedy showing an elderly widow, with a wig, who has a widower in the toils of an engagement. The widower wants to withdraw, but her pugilistic son won't hear of this. The widower also has a son who is a still better boxer. He does up the first youth. The picture made an audience (6 p. m.) on Broadway titter. No one laughed heartily, but many seemed to enjoy it. The acting is amusing. It is a fair filler.

"THE GOVERNOR WHO HAD A HEART" (Vitagraph), March 27.—A picture intended as a help to child labor reform. It is well acted by Mr. Humphries, as the Governor, with Miss Edith Story, as his wife, and Adele de Garde, as his little girl, who deserves special mention. The story is substantial and is truthful. Perhaps it is truer, as a statement of fact, than was a much more powerful picture of the same subject, released about a month ago by another licensed company, called "Children Who Labor." We commend it highly, however, as a worthy picture, and the spectators gave it their attention. The photographs are very good. It can not be called a feature; it is too slow.

"THE GIRL AND HER TRUST" (Biograph), March 28.—A railroad melodrama that is very good. It improves on its predecessor, "The Lonedale Operator." It is the same story freshly told and shows a young woman telegraph operator alone in the country station, and tramps breaking into the place to steal the big invoice of money. The rescue engine, on its way, brings about the climax; but it is a better picture than the other. We liked it very much and those around us also did. It is competently made in every way and is a good feature picture.

"THE REMITTANCE MAN" (Melies), March 28.—A melodrama of the mining camps, dealing with a young aristocrat, the remittance man, who went to work; and a pretty girl, the miner's daughter, whom he won for his bride. By this time he had become an earl and she a countess. The story is not very vividly pictured; it is not told in the best or most dramatic way. With these players, backgrounds and the scenario, it might have been improved easily. The picture should have been better. The photographs are fair; some are very good. It will pass as a filler.

"THE SUIT OF ARMOR" (Vitagraph), March 29.—John Bunny plays a good part in this very delightful comedy. The Vitagraph people have a new dog, a terror, if looks count for much; and they know how to use him effectively. Bunny plays the objecting father, owner of the suit of armor. Miss Walker is the girl. Mr. Earl Williams is the young lover who gets into the house inside the suit of armor that had been sent out for repairs. He and the girl elope, he in the armor and she in a fur coat borrowed from the chauffeur. They are married in that costume. The audience roared with laughter. The photographs are fine. The two on this reel make a Saturday night picture that is very desirable.

"THE HAUNTED ROCKER" (Vitagraph), March 29.—Mr. Ober's expressive countenance is the best of this slight, but very sprightly farce. He is an objecting parent. Clara Kimball Young and Mr. Powers play the lovers. There are only three scenes—the room with the rocking chair near the window and near a screen; the front yard; and the parent's club, where he tells his jovial friends about the mysterious rocker. The lovers break Dad in in first class shape.

"AT THE END OF THE TRAIL" (Essanay), March 28.—A winter-time picture set in the great Northwest, played by four people—the Indian who falls exhausted, the bad man who refused to bother with him, the good Samaritan who brought him to the cabin, and the Royal N. W. Mounted Police officer on horseback who is looking for the bad man. There is a struggle between the officer and the bad man, in which the latter comes out best. Then there is another struggle in the cabin between the bad man and the good Samaritan, the bad man leaving his host for dead and making off with his dogs and sled and the man's gold. The Indian follows the bad man with his benefactor's dogs. The officer has also recovered and is set upon the trail. It kept the audience's attention. There are some very interesting scenes and the photographs are very good for the most part. We enjoyed it and think it a desirable filler.

"NUTTY'S GAME" (Kalem), March 28.—A farce that made a Broadway audience laugh heartily. Nutty's game was tag; he only happened to be carrying a big knife. The brandishing of it was a part of the game; but it scared Brown. Nutty was followed in his chase of Brown by cops, girls and other citizens.

"TIM AND JIM" (Kalem), March 28.—This farce, on the same reel, is also a laugh maker, but it didn't get quite the reception that the chase picture did. It is hard to understand, however.

"A WAIF OF THE SEA" (Selig), March 28.—A seaside, fisher folk story with first class heart interest. The waif of the sea is a little lad who certainly wins the affections of the spectators. In the early scenes he is cast up by the sea, near the fishing village, a very little but sunny lad, and is adopted by a fatherly old salt. This old fisherman is put over as an individual such as would be called a "character," by a very good player. When the lad is about seven, this foster father is drowned and he is left to his own resources. He begins to search for his own mother, of whom he had been told, and has the usual locket about his neck. He stows away on his father's ship. The rough but hearty sailors of this vessel are fine and the little incident on deck while the boy is saying the Lord's Prayer is excellently conceived and made. There is a homely, wholesome, old-fashioned atmosphere of truth and humanity about the picture that will make it popular. It will do for Sunday Schools and also for the Bowery as a feature. It will serve as such on Saturday night if the rest of the program is pretty fair.

"A VICTIM OF FIRE WATER" (Pathe), March 27.—A story dealing with an Indian, son of a chief, who was expelled from Carlisle College for being drunk, came home and went to perdition. In the end, he gives himself up in order to provide the reward, offered for him dead or alive, for the widow and orphan of his victim and one-time friend. It isn't a pleasant picture. The only popular features are the struggle, shooting, chase and the dramatic climax at the end which is not new.

"RICE AND OLD SHOES" (Lubin), March 27.—An excellent, strong picture. It is not a romance, but a sophisticated picture of married life. The young people are on the verge of separation, but postpone proceeding in order to put no damper on a younger sister's wedding. After the pretty wedding, they come back to the house together. There is rice on the woman's hat. It is too much for them and the disagreeable tangle into which they had managed to bring themselves is smoothed out. It is played very well by Miss May Buckley and Mr. Jack Holliday, but the former is especially commendable in this part which is suited to her. The photographs and scenes are beautiful. The books in the library ought not to have been so dry looking. No woman would choose such volumes, law books, agricultural reports, etc.; the man wasn't that kind. The scenario very wisely uses humor to save the situation, just as in life. We liked it, as did others. It's a feature, a fine feature for cultivated people.

"CURED" (Essanay), April 2.—This picture covers the same field as the Vitagraph of a few weeks ago, called "Irene's Infatuation"; but it isn't so good a picture. It is rather slow. Both were suggested by a well known story and this the Vitagraph picture followed more closely. The situation is a good one and, where the former has not been shown, this will make a fair filler.

"NAMING THE BABY" (Cines), April 2.—A picture of a little family tiff between the first baby's young parents over the name it is to have. There are one or two laughs; but it is slow.

"ASSISI" (Cines), April 2.—Here are some extremely beautiful colored views of Assisi, the hill city in Italy, famous as the home of St. Francis. We enjoyed this offering very much and those around us seemed also deeply interested in it.

"THE MINE ON THE YUKON" (Edison), April 2.—A picture telling an interesting story; but it is not dramatic and fails to get over strongly, being a little too slow and unconvincing. It shows the plucky fight of a woman to make a mine pay. Her late husband had believed in it, but no one else did. She worked it under great difficulties, and when it began to make good, it was wrested from her. She got it back again. The scenes might have been improved in little things. It is a filler.

"TENDERFOOT BOB'S REGENERATION" (Selig), April 2.—A picture of a drunken tramp's regeneration. Cowboy generosity and the man's old mother helped to bring this about. It didn't convince us and didn't seem to interest those around us. Some of the spectators laughed at wrong times, and one left in the middle of it. Most of the pictures seem slow this week, with three or four bright exceptions, and this one will get past in good company. The interior photographs are good; the exterior scenes are not very clear.

"SHE NEVER KNEW" (Vitagraph), April 2.—An emotional, pathetic picture of a little sick girl and her old grandfather. The old man was discharged and had no money. The little girl at home was never to know it and the old man went to heroic extremes to keep it from her. It is very well acted by Charles Kent as the grandfather and by little Miss Costello as the sick child. The picture gets over very effectively and made some in the audience weep. The photography is good and the whole management of the situation is commendable for its keeping within the significant things and for its economy. It is a feature.

"THE CLEMENCY OF ISABEAU" (C. G. P. C.), April 2.—A dramatic story of the middle ages, set, it must have been, in a magnificent palace, and made very effective. The coloring makes it a beautiful painting. It is also well acted and its significance gets over. It was applauded by a well filled house and very enthusiastic comments were heard near the reviewer. It is a sure feature picture.

"HELLO, CENTRAL" (Lubin), April 1.—An amusing, romantic comedy, played by Miss May Buckley, as the telephone girl, and by Mr. Harry Meyer, as the business man who sent the hurry call. He had already fallen in love with the pretty central. He sent the call and she didn't hear; she was pinning on the flowers he had sent her. He got no reply and reported the girl. He was very much peeved until he found out who the girl he had reported was, and then she was the furious one. The next time he used the line he proposed. Mrs. Walters adds much to the picture's opening scene by a moment's very good acting. The final scene of the picture, a little catch of love at the foot of the stairs, is very pretty and very well acted. It was much more natural than some of the other scenes were. The photographs are good; the story clear, fresh and interesting; and the release can be relied upon to furnish entertainment even to the critical.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY," April 1.—A very good number; better than the last three or four have been. Among its best items is a good picture of the St. Patrick's Day Parade in New York City, with Mayor Gaynor and Cardinal Farley in the reviewing stand; the funeral procession (very impressive) of Count Alois d'Arenthal, the late Austrian minister of foreign affairs, and leader of the peace party in the Austro-Hungarian kingdom; the interesting flights of Aviator Coffyn in his hydroplane, "The Canvas Back Duck"; the floods in Seville, Spain, etc.

"THE BANKER'S DAUGHTER" (Kalem), March 29.—A melodramatic picture that is acted stiffly. It has a novelty—the chase in ice-boats by police of a defaulting bank cashier. This is slow, however. The means the banker's daughter and her lover, the teller, took to stop the run on the bank, when the thefts became known, were not at all convincing. The picture, however, will be entertainment to a large number of uncritical people. It is well photographed. That old butler at the banker's house is a good actor. We don't say the other players were not good actors; for the situation was not one easy to interpret. It will pass as a filler.

"THOSE HICKSVILLE BOYS" (Biograph), April 1.—They were would-be vaudeville comedians, but "got the hook" and were carrying their trunk home along the track when they got into an adventure, through attempting to steal some oranges from a grove. It made the people laugh.

"OH! THOSE EYES" (Biograph), April.—This farce comedy has more freshness than the above; the first half of it is, indeed, very amusing. The last half made the loud laughs, the first half the best laughs. The young lady who played the girl with "those eyes" was able to put a good deal of real fun, with something tangible to human experience, into the situation. She seemed to get amusement out of playing it. It makes a pretty good farce, a desirable filler. The photographs of both are all that is required.

"THE STAR REPORTER" (Vitagraph), April 1.—At one moment in this romantic drama, Miss Edith Story, who plays one lead, was at her best; but it doesn't give her any real chance to act, that is, to show imagination. Mr. Harry Northrup plays the other lead. The story isn't very much above the commonplace, but it is interesting. The photographs are good. It is a very fair filler.

"A MEXICAN ELOPEMENT" (Pathe), March 28.—This elopement story, in its straightforward, simple form, with a horseback chase at the end, as in this case, has been done again and again. It has the elements of popularity, and the people seemed to watch it again with interest. Perhaps never before in any moving picture did lovers climb over just these walls or their horses canter slowly up just these roads, with the perplexing fork road; perhaps never before did the priest come out on just this church porch, so the picture has many points of fresh interest. The photographs are good. It is a filler.

"JEAN OF THE JAIL" (Kalem), April 1.—A picture in and around a jail in Old Mexico. The jailer gets sick. We see how his prisoner is helped to his escape. The jailer's daughter, Jean, gets her sweetheart, Jose, to follow and bring back the prisoner. This is accomplished before the Governor finds out the absence. There are dramatic incidents in it, but it isn't a dramatic picture. The story is a mere episode without special depth or significance and it seems a little slow. Jose has a struggle on the edge of a ravine with the escaped prisoner and rolls over it with him. At this the audience, who had seen something not unlike it once or twice before, laughed. The photographs are fair. It is a filler.

"ALL ON ACCOUNT OF CHECKERS" (Selig), March 29.—A farce comedy that has a very good situation and is full of laughs. An absent-minded professor is sent on an errand by his wife and gets into a game of checkers at the fire-engine house. In the mean time, a sentence in one of his stories about "making away" with a wife; a dressmaking model, wrapped up in a sheet; a piece of raw liver; some blood stains from the liver, a couple of burlesque sleuths, a very fat cook and the police manage to get the innocent old gentleman behind the bars. The photographs are good. It's a desirable filler.

"HOW WASHINGTON CROSSED THE DELAWARE" (Edison), March 29.—An historical melodrama with a scene in it played up to the famous picture of the American Army's passage of the ice-choked river which is in nearly every United States history. It stirred the audience more than any picture in several weeks. We saw it, however, at Lowe's Herald Square house and the music was perfect. In truth, it was the trumpets and drums that put it across so effectively. Under these conditions it made a very deep impression. A military picture can hardly rise to its real power without military music. This picture is a sure feature, good for Saturday night with good music; but good with or without the music.

"JIMMIE'S MISFORTUNE" (Pathe), March 30.—Jimmy is a newsboy of about twelve, and is working hard to buy, for his crippled little sister, a wheel chair. The picture aims at pathos. It shows how Jimmy, who was given a ten dollar bill to break, got run over by an automobile and failed to come back with the change. The man and his wife (Mr. Wilbur and Miss Gwendolin Pate) looked him up at the police station and found he had been taken to the hospital. After that, times brightened for Jimmy, his sister and all concerned. It is acted by good players, but is not made at all convincing and is not effective. The family behind the reviewer liked it, or seemed to. They understood it all; but, on the other hand, they entirely misunderstood the picture that followed it, viz: the clear, historical Edison release of the day before, "Washington Crossing the Delaware."

"THE SOCIAL SECRETARY" (Lubin), March 30.—A very pleasing and well made picture. Miss Ormi Hawley, who plays the social secretary, has the kind of personality that quickly wakens and holds sympathy in romantic rôles. She has freshness of youth and naturalness that are convincing. Mr. Jack Holliday plays the fiance of her employer, a social leader. This match had only a spark of dying fire left and the man falls in love with the new secretary. The situation is kept safely within the conventional limits and is pleasing throughout. There are in the picture interesting glimpses of social life and well made interiors of a home of fashionable people. It is sure to please, especially as it has a good child part. It has some substance and excellent humor. It will be a good feature for ordinary occasions. It is photographed "as clear as a bell."

"A FUNERAL THAT FLASHED IN THE PAN" (Edison), March 30.—The comedy situation at the close of this picture made a fair audience roar with merriment. It is a college story. It isn't convincing. The college youths act with marked camera consciousness. The producer bunched them at times right in the center. Only the last quarter of it really gets over. It's a filler.

"NEMESIS" (Vitagraph), March 30.—A picture that doesn't live up to its name. It is played by three people—Van Dyke Brooke, Maurice Costello and Miss Rose Tapley. There is business in it that is not clear, of such are one or two rather long conversations. Mr. Brooke plays a very melodramatic climax well, but it hasn't been convincingly led up to and fails to get over strongly. The other two players are denied much chance to act in it. It is a slow filler.

"A CHRISTIAN SLAVE" (Cines), March 30.—We call this a feature chiefly because it has a new atmosphere. It is a romantic haarem picture, taken in Tripoli, and full of very convincing local color. It tells the adventures of a young newspaper war correspondent, who is captured, receives the Arabian hospitality of a sheik and finds, in the palace of his stately, dark-skined host, a beautiful Christian slave. It also shows how he escaped and later brought the Italian troops to rescue her. It is very well done and also well photographed. It will make a safe feature for ordinary occasions.

Independent.

"TWO WOMEN" (Republic) April 2.—A picture of the Northwest, not in winter, but at the opening of spring, about the time when homesteaders begin to enter the territory. The story deals with passion and marital infidelity, shows struggle and death. The two women were wives. The first husband fell in love with the wife of the second and was killed by him. The second wife dies. This leaves a widow and a widower who meet and fall in love. The picture's dramatic climax is the widower's confession to the widow. She calls upon her husband's friends for vengeance, but hears more of the story, and is sorry. In the end, love overcomes everything. It isn't convincing, wholly, but it is well acted and the backgrounds are in keeping. We don't call it a feature; but it will make a fair filler. The photographs are plain, but a bit foggy.

"TWO MEN AND THE LAW" (Nestor), April 3.—Mr. Jack Conway and Mr. George Gebbert play the two men, leading rôles in this picture of red-blood life in the West. The former is the outlaw, the second the sheriff. The picture opens with a chase in the moonlight through pretty scenes which are effectively brought out by Nestor camera work. By accident the sheriff occupies the same room in a hotel that the bad man has and he is discovered. From this point on the action is very similar to a Bison picture of some months back, but a bit more sensational. It has to be very closely followed to be understood. We call it a fair filler.

"DURING THE CARNIVAL" (Great Northern), April 6.—There is apt to be much similarity in carnival stories. Most of them show the wife discovering the disguise of the husband's enamorata and appearing at the carnival in it, the husband taking her for the other girl. In this picture it is the wife's friend who wears the costume and brings the man blindfolded home to his wife, which is the more convincing, better way. The photographs ars clear. The release will pass as a good filler.

"MOTHER" (Reliance), April 6.—The "mother" in this picture, played by Mrs. Hurley, is deserted by her son, who is wild, but whom she loves very much. Mr. Walthall plays this son. He is shown as prosperous and the mother as in distressing poverty. A freshly pleasing way is found to bring mother and son together. The quality that the picture has, however, does not depend so much upon the play as upon the way the picture is handled, which is straightforward and natural, and upon the acting which is very good. The situation is not a deep one, but the picture can be counted as a desirable, good filler. The mechanical work is commendable.

"LOVE IS BLIND" (Reliance), April 20.—A very pretty picture indeed. It shows us an artist (played by Mr. Henry Walthall) who is painting a picture of the Madonna. The daughter of the boarding-house keeper, rather slovenly in her dress, but very pretty, is posing for it. Miss Gertrude Robinson plays this part, and is most charmingly simple in it. Miss Fearnley plays a wealthy countess whom the artist thinks he loves. The boarding-house keeper's daughter loves him. He gets this poor girl to put on a very becoming dress and is so struck by her beauty that he falls in love with her. The picture's straightforward simplicity and sweetness give to it a special charm. It is a picture to please, not excite. It could be shown anywhere. We call it a commendable feature.

"THE DOVE AND THE SERPENT" (Imp), April 4.—A very pretty picture, telling a tragic love story of Latin-American people, perhaps Mexicans. It is well acted; also the costuming, staging and scene choosing are very carefully done. It is an excellent and true picture of the tropic lands south of us, full of sunlight, warmth and passion. The story is well conducted, clear and interesting. The young heroine is abandoned by her husband for a girl of the drinking place with a rose in her hair. He is frightened into coming back, but now the girl refuses him. It is a good feature picture, well photographed and of substantial qualities.

"THE JOY RIDE" (Powers), April 2.—The maid (Miss Elder) puts on the tailor-made suit and willow plume of her mistress (Miss Fritzi) and goes out for a walk, flirts with a young man who owns an automobile, and gives him one of her mistress' cards. Plenty of trouble comes of it. It is fresh and there's a sparkle of good comedy at the end. Miss Elder is a very good comedienne, Miss Fritzi is very pretty and a good actress also. Mr. Travers and Mr. Charles play the two men. It is a good comedy picture, well photographed and commendable.

"AUNT AURORA" (Gaumont), April 2.—A very well acted comedy, and, for the most part, set in very pretty scenes. Aunt Aurora is played by a very fine actress, the regular Gaumont leading lady. She is very good in comedy or any human situation; is good in this picture; but her work in romantic tragedy is magnificent. The situation here is slight, but worthy. The photographs are clear. It is a pleasing picture. The farce on the same reel, though, is a better picture to show. The Independent people are fortunate in having Gaumont pictures on their list.

"CALINO AS MASON" (Gaumont), April 2.—This farce comedy is on the same reel with the above. It shows the peculiar house that Calino made. The floors are not true and the boards haven't been nailed down. How do they think up such doings? It is a roar and a scream. It is well photographed and well produced. Fine! A Saturday night farce, the best of its kind this week.

"KID, KITE AND KITTY" (Eclair), April 2.—A burlesque melodrama, telling the love story of "Kitty," a New York girl, "Kid," a cowboy, and "Kite," the villainous cousin of the girl who wants to marry her to get her fortune. It has the real thing in the way of thrills, also some good things, like an excellent view of New York Harbor, and some very amusing situations. It will get over. A pretty good filler. The photographs are very fair, but the lighting of the interiors isn't quite natural.

"LIFE OR GOLD" (Republic), March 30.—A picture with a miser and a little girl, his niece, as its chief characters. It tells a story highly melodramatic, but well acted, and it gets over into our sympathies. The photography is very good. The picture stands on its chief interpretation, that of the miser. This is very well done.

"THE DIVORCE CURE" (Champion), April 3.—A picture carrying a young married couple from the wedding on through the rough weather that the matrimonial ship soon meets. They are young people of wealth, and have all that money can buy but happiness. No children come to them. It looks as though there is going to be a separation; but a little orphan is adopted and both husband and wife become much attached to him. The difficulty is solved in the end, forever, by the advent of a baby of their own. Miss Evelyn Francis, in the leading rôle, is charming. The whole atmosphere of this picture is wholesome and pleasing. The photographs are good. It is a picture that will be liked, a desirable, good filler.

"BILLY'S TROUBLESOME GRIP" (Solax), April 5.—A Fanny Simpson and Billy Quirk comedy picture. Billy plays the part of a benedict whose wife is jealous. He gets a young woman's grip, like his, by mistake. Fanny Simpson plays this girl. She is trying to get her grip back. He is trying to get rid of it, but can't. At length Billy packs 'em (nearly a score are following by this time) all inside the grip. It is a trick film, full of speedy, rush-and-tumble business and full of laughs. It doesn't drag. It is a good picture of its kind.

"THE GIRL OF THE GROVE" (Thanhouser), April 5.—An orange grove picture story, taken in Florida. The girl is boss of the grove. A stranger, coming in to see the grove, finds her at work, dressed in overalls. This meeting is followed, a few weeks later, by a love scene set up in a great tree with branches like immense arms. The "boss," later finds that the man is married. The man's sick wife is neglected; the disillusioned girl, the "boss," is also despondent. Each is on the point of drowning herself; but the "boss" rescues the wife. The girls comfort each other. It is pretty well photographed in interesting backgrounds; but it is slight. A good, romantic filler.

"KID CANFIELD" (Champion), April 1.—This two-reel picture shows the life story of a notorious gambler, how he became a sharper, and his reformation. It is an absorbingly interesting picture, with an educative purpose. The first reel ends with a dramatic climax. The gambler has cheated his own brother out of his all, and only discovers the identity of the stranger after the suicide and by his mother's photograph in the youth's hand. He sees a vision of his mother and decides to reform. The second reel exposes different ways of stacking cards. The man's fingers know the cards like eyes. It also shows different makes of "phony" cards. The thimble rigging game is also shown up, with the three card monte game, loaded dice, "hold-out" machines, etc. It ends with a back to home and mother scene. "Kid" Canfield plays the picture himself and it tells his own life story. He has become well known by his lectures and exposé of gamblers' tricks. It is a good picture to show (it should pay) and it is a good picture to see; it is very interesting. The photographs are good.

"THE MAN AND THE MAID" (American), April 1.—The young ranch owner goes down to Coronado and falls into the hands of "society," but, unfortunately for the schemers, he meets the hotel's parlor maid. "Society" has a jolt. The parlor maid saves him from being cheated, and for this she is discharged. The cowboy marries her. It makes a clear, interesting story. The backgrounds are pack scenes, Coronado hotel scenes and bits of a ranch. It is a good filler.

"THE WHITE APRONS" (Eclair), April 4.—The superintendent of the cooking school gets a presentation pie, made by the young ladies. He ate his piece; his friends, with whom he divided it, otherwise disposed of theirs. After that first pie, the school made others. We see about a dozen; they are buried in the superintendent's garden. The farce is not without pleasing quality, but is very slight, and has no sharply indicated point. It will pass as a filler, or as a lightener to a program.

"THE WITCH'S NECKLACE" (Solax), April 3.—Tourists from the East visit an old Indian medicine woman among the weird cliffs in the Garden of the Gods, Colorado. This witch has a strange necklace that is charmed. One of the tourists covets it; but her husband won't buy it. This young woman, in a pet, refuses to proceed with her friends. She falls asleep and in a dream is given the necklace. The charm, by trick photography, is shown as dreadfully working. It is rather effective. The photographs are good. The film can be counted on as nearly a feature.

"THE AGITATOR" (American), April 4.—An out-of-doors picture of Southern California, with sunlight and palm tree shade. The agitator is the foreman who comes back to the ranch from a vacation in the city with his head full of crazy ideas. He preaches to the punchers and gets them full of whiskey and incites a riot. They demand that the ranch owner divide his wealth. The owner and one brave cowboy (Kerrigan) fight the gang through a hedge of pine trees. The battle is continued later, around a place of refuge with the owner's daughter (Miss Bush), and the cowboy firing over a little breastwork. The photographs are clear, but might have had more detail. It makes a good filler.

"THE STAR OF THE SIDE SHOW" (Thanhouser), April 2.—The Star of the Side Show is the "Thanhouser Kid" (little Marie Eline), who takes the rôle of a midget. In the early scenes she is a little Dutch woman in sabots, who refuses a proposal of marriage from a neighbor, also a midget. She joins a show and has a very amusing flirtation with the show's giant. He is sick with love for the serpent charmer and she feels the pangs of jealousy; but the other midget also comes to the show and we have a pretty wedding ceremony. It is something fresh, new and delightfully amusing. It makes a very good feature. The photographs are fine.

"ANIMATED WEEKLY NO. 3" (M. P. Distributing & Sales Co.), March 20.—A very good, broad number, giving several items of exceptional interest. Perhaps the best of these is the burial of the Maine heroes and the funeral of Arenthal, the great Austrian statesman. The scenes about the courthouse and jail at Hillsville will attract attention. There are some instructive pictures of the doings in Carnival Week in Dresden, also Straasburg, also Madrid. The German Empress is pictured on the occasion of her visit to the Woman's Exposition, which makes an interesting item. There are some new evening gowns pictured and items of less interest.

"AN OPPORTUNE BURGLAR" (Reliance), April 13.—A picture showing the temptation of a young woman, who had married her elderly employer. After the marriage the man's nephew fell in love with her. The burglar came at a fortunate time. The girl was alone with the woman when her husband returned. He was found instead of the young man. The experience woke the woman and she dismissed the nephew. It is very dramatic and very well acted by Mr. H. Walthall, as the nephew, and Miss Fernleigh as the wife. The sets and photographs are very good. We can safely commend it as a feature, although it has a rather unpleasant situation.

THE MICROSCOPE AND THE CINEMATOGRAPH.

Utilizing the powers of the cinematograph, the microscope has become a new instrument. Buried in the science room and relegated to minute and, to the average scholar, dry and monotonous studies, it was looked upon as an instrument of research only. The new life and powers with which it is now endowed are making it at once the most necessary and popular instrument in use to-day. In every room and grade it is traveling from science room to kindergarten and back again. Furthermore, a new field of usefulness has opened up before it; research study, exhibition and teaching are now its common qualities, making its hitherto limited powers as wide and as unlimited as the cinematograph, under whose chaperonage it is being introduced into every state of society. Such pictures as "The X-Rays Explained," "The Carrot Caterpillar," "The Study of the Fly" and "Of the Bee" are samples of the blending of the powers of two instruments into one in what may be called the Microscopic Cinematograph.

A new and attractively interesting incentive to the gaining of knowledge without study, knowing without learning, remembering because it is impossible to forget, are the benefits conferred upon the scholar in our schools of to-day. While teacher and scholar are thus helped, the lecturer upon higher subjects has found his heaviest labors reduced to a minimum, to say nothing of having more than three-fourths of his difficut explanations taken from him; while to his hearers the advantage is more than a hundred fold, and the dry yet necessary lecture, tolerated in the pursuit of knowledge, has become an alluring principle pregnant with untold values. From that which has been accomplished, visions of a still larger future are before us and of the countless benefits which the cinematograph has conferred upon the human race the alliance with the microscope is second to none.

Projection Department

Edited by F. H. RICHARDSON.

WHILE the Editorial Departments has voiced the sentiment of us all with regard to him who has departed, still the Editor of this Department, out of the depth of a very genuine grief, feels moved to add a word.

We have been to some extent associated with Mr. Chalmers, the late editor of this paper, for five years. Since our arrival in New York City almost two and a half years ago, the association has been close and personal. We loved the man for what he was—a rugged type of true manhood. He was a good friend; staunch, true and generous to a fault.

Mr. Chalmers had a distinct individuality. He was, in some respects, what might be termed a "character," but it was a type of "character" we might well have more of. He was a good fighter, too, as some have ample reason to know; but his fighting was fair and above-board.

The manner of his taking was a terrific shock to us all. One moment we were smiling, the next we stared overcome by horror into an open grave. We laid a spray of flowers in his pale, cold hands, forever stilled. On their petals it shames us not to say were glistening drops from eyes unwet for many years. It was to us as though a loved brother had voyaged outward through the hovering mists of the unknown, and left us standing lonely and alone.

"A sight for the past, and a tender tear
For those who have gone before,
On the phantom boats that disappear
In the mists of that Endless Shore."

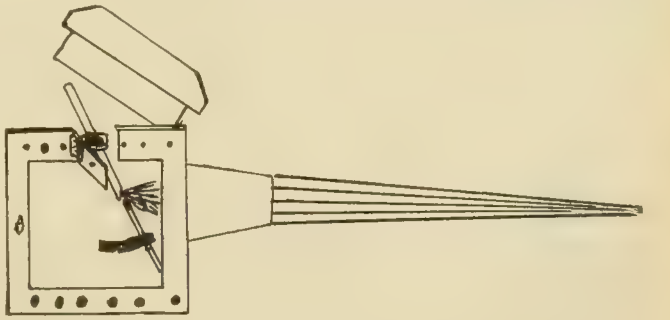
NEW UNION.—Waterbury, Kan., writes: "The operators of this city have at last, through the hard and persistent efforts of Ralph Stanco, operator of the Eden Theater of this city, been organized. Brother Stanco put in all his off time for about three weeks, and finally succeeded in getting 12 signatures to the charter application, out of the total of 16 operators in the city. Inasmuch as only 12 signatures were secured we could not get a direct charter, but were obliged to become auxiliary to local No 88 I. A. T. S. E.. I do not know if this is the first operators' union in the state, but if so I trust it will not be the last. In organization there is much to be gained and nothing to lose. We have no local by-laws as yet, and would be glad to receive copies of the by-laws of other unions to help us in drafting our own."

I am, indeed, glad to "shake hands" with the new organization. As you say, there is much to be gained and nothing to lose through organization. If one or two local unions will send in copies of their by-laws, I will be glad to forward same to Waterbury.

AKRON, OHIO, comes across with the following: "I have been an interested reader of the Projection Department for a long time. I note some letters which sound to me rather boastful. The operator who keeps his machine in good condition, projects a picture which is good, clear, and has a sharp focus, cuts out all frame ups, keeps his projection and condenser lens clean, starts off in frame so that the audience can read the title, and has a good clear field at all times—what more can he do? Assuming also that picture pleases the manager, and audience. Now regarding the Tucson operator (March 30th issue), who ran four months without having any stops during the projection of a picture, and who has used three and four week films. He certainly is 'going some.' No film breaks, no belt breaks (both of which are unadvoidable) and no trouble of any kind. He certainly is lucky. We run two to seven-day service and I am very careful, but he has me beat by two or three stops a week. How does he do it? I would like to know the secret. I am in the same boat with our North Carolina friend concerning the 'nailed-to-the-screen' picture. Now if what they mean by their 'nailed-to-the-wall' talk is that the picture isn't doing a Salome dance or a turkey trot, I can show them plenty such pictures. I have run new Pathe, Selig and Biograph pictures in which you could not see any movement whatever, but take one reel with another, I couldn't get by with the 'nailed-to-the-wall' stunt. I ran a picture the other day which had a sidewise movement. It was very faulty in this respect. The trouble did not lie in the machine or the operator, but I got the blame just the same. Another thing: some operators claim to get good light with 20 to 25 amperes. That gets my goat. We have a mirror screen and use 60 amperes A. C., but we have some light, believe me. An operator told me once he only used 19 amperes. I guess he was right for his picture showed it, or rather it did not show, since at times it could scarcely be seen. Why are so many Kalem films foggy? Also some of the Selig pictures are not clear and sharp like others."

The operator who kept his machine in good condition, cut out misframes, etc., as you have set forth, would be doing many of the things which together constitute good projection. Still there are many other things just as important, one of which is the careful gauging of speed to suit the subject being projected. I can not agree with you that there should be any necessity for an operator stopping his machine in the middle of a reel three or four times a week, or, for that matter, once a week. I once operated for the second oldest theater in Chicago, on North Clark street, of which Mr. W. R. Cozart was manager and owner, for five months, and during all that time the machine was never stopped during a projection of a film. To get results of that kind one has, however, to be very careful, indeed, and pay close attention to his work, personally inspecting all films, re-cementing loose patches, notching broken sprocket holes, and putting the film in first class condition. His machine, of course, must be kept in very careful adjustment. That "nailed-to-the-wall" picture I have already commented on. As to amperage, that altogether depends on the size of picture. However, the largest mirror screen there is is 18 feet wide, and I cannot believe there is necessity for the use of 60 amperes of current on an 18 foot picture projected on a mirror screen. You must understand that a picture can be made too bright, as well as too dull, and if you are getting the full value from that 60 amperes, and your mirror screen is clean and in good condition, you certainly have got "some light." I should think it would blind the eyes of your audience.

LOS ANGELES PRAISED.—From Cordova, Alaska, comes the following: "I noticed in the department recently, an article comparing Los Angeles projection with that of New York. If New York lays claim to even as good projection as Los Angeles, New York will have to 'go some.' I know about the latter city for I worked there, and thereabouts, for nearly four years. Projection in Los Angeles is all that can be desired; sharp, clear, flickerless, and, in fact, thoroughly up to date. Moreover, the houses are simply grand. There is nothing slouchy, even in the least pretentious. They all show adequate taste, and real refinement, and do they pay? Well, I guess. They have packed houses every night. People there are willing to pay 10, 15 and even 20 cents admission, and they always see the best. The smaller houses vie with the larger ones for excellence in service, projection and comfort. There is but one town equal to Los Angeles in projection, and that is San Francisco. The theaters there, however, are themselves inferior. The men employed in San Francisco are the best it is possible to obtain. The San Francisco Union looks after that, and also takes care of the matter of apprentices. Aberdeen, Tacoma and Seattle are about on the same plane as to projection and theaters. I was through those cities last Fall, and visited most of the houses. What am I doing here in Alaska? Well, I am working at the Empress Theater, which is a real swell little house, having a capacity of 300. There is a stage with fine scenery. The house has a large lobby, opera chairs, and a 12-foot operating room with Powers' six machine, to which I added a dissolving Stereopticon. There is a commodious work bench, and frame light (my own term) with which I frame, or rather set the film in frame, when threading. I have a brake for the rewinder, and one other thing which is rather essential for quick work and convenience. I cut the top edge of my lamphouse as shown in sketch. This allows me to reach the screw of the top carbon-clamp quickly. The body of the lamphouse is strong enough to allow of making this cut, and it adds convenience in fastening the top carbon. At to my projection, the people hereabouts, as well as travelers, agree that it is a 'darn good show.' Sail for civilization about the 20th of this month. Bound for—???"

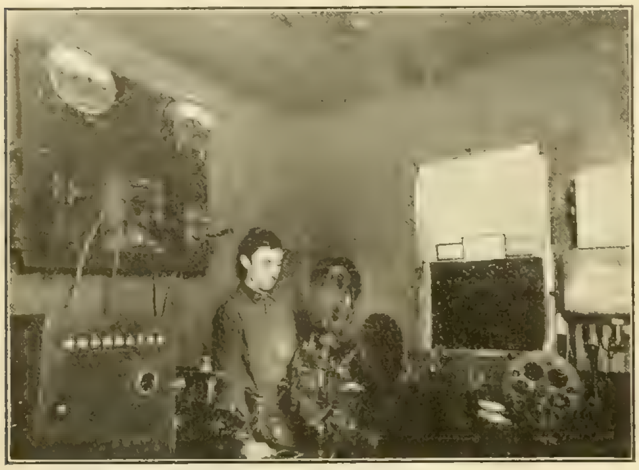


Well, my boy, I should say you were putting matters rather strong in regards to Los Angeles. Your report does not agree with that of others. The way I have the matter sized up is that Los Angeles has some very beautiful theaters equipped with every possible device and convenience for good projection, but there are also other theaters which will probably average up about the same as those of other cities. Taken as a whole, Los Angeles is, I presume, however, considerably above the average. As to the cutting of the lamphouse, I am sorry to say that I can not commend that particular scheme. It weakens the lamphouse very greatly, and I do not believe it is necessary, although, of course, somewhat convenient. Judging by what the weather has been in New York City this winter, I should say that Alaskans would be engaged principally in keeping from freezing to death.

ONE FOR SELIG.—Binghamton, N. Y., contributes the following: "What in the world does Selig use for a lens when he takes some of his pictures? One operator offered to bet me it was the bottom of a 10 cent gold fish bowl in combination with the end of a champagne bottle, focus XXX dry. Really, there are lots of complaints."

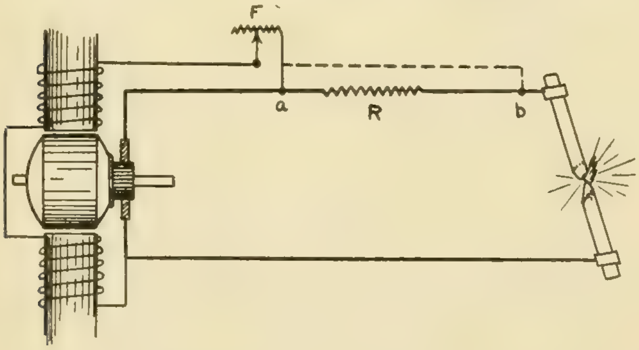
I think this matter may well be seriously considered by Brother Selig. There are certainly plenty of roasts on some of his pictures, and the work is otherwise too magnificent to be injured thus. It is not the lens, I think. I am not conversant enough with the photographic end of things to say with certainty just where the trouble does lie. However, there is no question but what some of the Selig pictures, while splendidly acted, beautifully staged, and all that, are not up to the standard in the matter of photography. Certain it is the fault is very much in evidence, and it should by all means be remedied.

FINE.—Mr. Seth E. Barnes, Wichita, Kan., writes: "I am sending you a picture of my operating room which may be of interest to the department readers. You will notice I use the Kimble variable speed to drive my machine. Have been using this motor for over a year, and it certainly works fine. I also use a motor on my rewind, although it does not show in the picture. I am a constant reader of the World and the projection department. I think the illustrated instructions on the machines are great. Would like to know if they will be pubilshed in book form and offered for sale."



Yes, the instructions will be in book form. I note you are using a Motiograph, the instructions for which are now being prepared. There are two or three things about this operating room with which I am particularly pleased. One is the tool rack. I see you have tools, and that they are kept neatly in order. I am very much pleased with the observation port. It is of ample size, enabling the operator to have a full and unobstructed view of his picture at all times. The voltmeter and ammeter look very good, though from the double throw switch, one side of which is marked A. C., and the other D. C., I am led to suppose you have a light plant of your own, and are connected also to the street alternating current lines. I was wondering how you managed to get into that hole behind the machine until I remembered that the Motiograph head swings on its base.

MORE FROM PITTSBURG, PA.—Mr. J. Frank Martin, Pittsburg, Pa., writes: "Now that I see my communication on Motor Generators in print, I can see where it falls short of being as clear as it should have been. I will therefore try to give you a more detailed explanation. However, I realize that space in the Projection Department is too limited to go into a lengthy discussion of this subject. In the sketch submitted herewith a resistance, R, connected in the circuit and the field circuit of the generator, is shown connected to one of the load leads at "A," which is the practice always followed in using standard constant voltage generators. With this arrangement the generator voltage will be constant because the exciting voltage is taken from the brush and commutator direct while the voltage and current at the arc are regulated by the resistance R, which absorbs the excess energy. Now, if the field wire is removed from A to B, we will have a different condition altogether. The voltage on the generator field is less, with arc burning, and it varies as the current at the arc varies. The resistance R is really in series with both the arc and the generator field and since the voltage across the resistance R varies with the current flow, the exciting voltage and generator vary with the flow of current. If, when connected as a constant voltage machine (field wire at A), the generator voltage is 110, the current at arc is 40 amperes, at 40 volts; connecting the field wire at B will reduce the generator voltage to 45 volts and the current flow would be only 16 amperes. To raise the current and voltage we would have to remove or cut out nearly all the resistance R, which also cuts out the losses proportionately. When using portable machines, or when the generator is placed in a basement, or at a distance from the operating room, the leads will have sufficient resistance to give the necessary regulation.



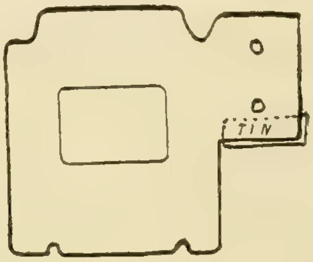
"Before closing I wish to say that the experiment of soaking carbons in brine has something to it. The first flaming arc carbon made had common salt (sodium chloride), mixed with soft carbon as a core. At the present time this carbon is the most efficient source of light known, but is not generally used because it burns very unsteadily. The 'needling' observed on carbons soaked in brine is due to chlorine gas uniting with the carbon. This gas is liberated from salt when it is decomposed, it is a very active agent and in this case is present in larger quantities in the outer layers of carbon where the greater part of the salt is deposited in the soaking process. This needling also increases the light considerably by reducing the carbon points and crater area which is the principle of the intensified arc now being exploited by a prominent electrical manufacturing concern."

It is easily understood that if the field current were connected as shown by dotted line—that is to say, the connection made between the rheostat, and the arc, there would be a very different condition set up than if it were connected at A. But it seems to me that kind of a proposition would not work at all. I should suppose there would be trouble in the armature immediately. My understanding has always been that a generator made to produce current at 110 volts, would not work well at any other voltage. I would prefer that this matter be discussed at length by some of our readers. We have a number of them who are thoroughly posted on such matters.

ADDRESS WANTED.—Chicago, Ill., writes: "Would you please give me the address of the Chicago Moving Picture Operators' Union? I have a 1912 Card and think I have sufficient experience, and would like to join."

Really, Chicago, I had to laugh when I read your request. You have written a thousand miles for information you could have secured by stepping in and asking the operator of any down town theatre in Chicago. I do not know the present street address of the Chicago union. You can however, secure same from Mr. Lee Hart, State Hotel, Chicago, Ill.

NEW STUNT.—Little Rock, Ark., writes: "You did not seem to quite understand my last letter (March 23rd issue); I will, therefore, try to make things a little more clear. As I said before, I have a 50 foot throw, a 12 foot picture, and the operating room is about 20 feet higher than the centre of the screen. Now this will naturally cause an out-of-focus effect on top or bottom of the screen. I placed a small piece of tin under the lower screw holding the aperture plate of my Edison machine. I do this to throw the top of the picture further away from the lens. This you can see will help to balance the incline on which I have to work. I want to know if you have anything better to suggest. I find the two 7½ condensers are, as you suggested, much better. You did not get the meaning of my graphite proposition clearly. I said 'a little graphite with some very heavy oil for the star wheel.' You remarked that I needed one of the hand books. Now if you had read the first part of my letter carefully you would have noticed its being headed with an order for the hand book, and back numbers of the World of various dates, which I received and would not be without."



You are correct about the hand book, and it is up to me to apologize. Very few of my correspondents are accustomed to writing for publication, and therefore I have to re-dictate about nine out of ten letters. I presume by the time I got 'round to the end of the answer to your letter, I had forgotten the hand book order contained in its opening sentence. Now as regards that aperture plate stunt: I really do not know how it will work. At first I thought it would not do at all, but more mature consideration leads me to believe that the out-of-focus effect experienced by reason of a heavy pitch, or a side throw, could be helped, and perhaps entirely remedied by the scheme you have adopted. Of course the side throw would necessitate the raising of one side of the aperture plate, instead of its bottom or top, and this would render the adjustment of some types of tension springs somewhat difficult. However, I commend this proposition to the careful consideration of those afflicted with a heavy pitch or side throw. It will not do away with the keystone effect, but I think, as I said before, it will be of benefit in overcoming much of the out-of-focus effect. I thank you very cordially for the submission of this scheme.

LIGHT PLANT.—Mr. Harry G. Waldron, Proprietor "Langdon" and "Electric" Theaters, Langdon, North Dakota, writes: "In the issue of March 23rd, Winnipeg, Can., finds fault with the low voltage generating set. You answered his objections well, but omitted some details that are worth considering. While it is true the chief advantage lies in the greater efficiency of the low voltage, on account of small resistance waste, there are other features to commend the low voltage, direct-connected set. I am in possession of the catalogue of the makers of the Brush direct-connected set, advertised in your columns. In case you have not seen their catalogue, I will say that it contains more information of a general character than I have ever seen in any similar publication. I have absolutely no interest in boosting them, aside from the fact that I wish to see such a perfect machine get the consideration it deserves. Direct-connected sets are more efficient because they save the belt energy wasted in belted sets. This outfit has a two cylinder upright engine, which is better than a one cylinder horizontal of the same power. It is a throttling engine, which means an absolutely steady speed. It occupies less space, weighs less, which means less freight, and does not require an electrical engineer to run it. Tanks, wire, meters, batteries and all go with it. There are a couple of other outfits made which use a one-cylinder engine of the two cycle marine type; a type of engine it is impossible to govern like a four cycle throttling engine. They furnish a 2 K. W. dynamo which is inadequate for the needs of the average exhibitor. The four K. W. dynamo of the Brush set supplies 3,960 watts, 66 amperes at 60 volts. As the arc only uses 40 amperes, there is ample supply for the 'indecent' lights. Lamps, fans and all the standard heating and power devices can be obtained in this voltage. The makers claim an expense of from 2 to 4c per K. W. for fuels of various kinds, from natural gas to gasoline. I believe you would be conferring a great benefit to the readers of our department by asking the Strelinger people to contribute an article on isolated plants while this generator discussion is going on. Am running in a rather small town, and hustling for everything I get. Perhaps my experience would interest the rest of the craft. Came here three years ago, to polish the ivories for a friend of mine who was running the largest house here. He threw it up, I got it. Ran a year, doing good business but at big expense, till, with $80 in the bank, I paid $50 down on an old building without a floor, the walls of which were nearly falling in. Worked at it, with one man to help, raising and installing a floor, repairing from top to bottom for six weeks. Opened up just at the time it was clear we were to have no crops. Pulled through, by working like a horse day and night. Have now paid for fixtures, etc., and the biggest part of the property. I could sell out now for a good figure. Have done all my own carpenter work and wiring; took care of the house and been a general 'Pooh-Bah.' It takes a small town to make a man develop ambidexterity. I can hear your 'smile' of sympathy. The only way you can get me out of the picture business is to shoot me. Hope you can get the Strelinger Company to describe this outfit. It may help clear up some points. Best wishes to the 'Department.' "

The columns of this Department are open at all time to any manufacturer who has anything of a purely instructive nature to set forth. We shall be glad to have the Strelinger Company contribute matter of this kind at any time. A direct connected set is, of course (other things being equal), better than a belted set; however, some very excellent reports have been sent in on the outfit by the Detroit Engine Works. You certainly have done well. I have observed that determination and hard work will accomplish wonders.

GHOSTLY GHOSTS.—Indiana (name of town suppressed by request): "Am using about 40 amperes of 110 volt, 60 cycle current through a Ft. Wayne Compensarc, ⅝ cored Bio Carbons; 12 foot picture at 94 feet; 6½ and 7½ condensers, 7½ e.f. projection lens, Powers Six machine. Have a dark round spot, about 3 feet in diameter, in the centre of the picture; also a green ghost at the left of the dark spot. When using 40 amperes, which is the current strength I need, the light is very unsteady, and most of the time I am troubled with a double spot, and the arc sputters and flames. Once in a great while the light will settle down to a nice round spot, but there will still be the ghost in the centre of the picture. I have moved the lamphouse back as far as possible, which has reduced the size of the ghost. Have the handbook, and have studied carbon setting. Do not believe my lower carbon tip interferes in the light. Have also cleaned all switches, carbon-jaws, etc., and put in new No. 6 asbestos covered lamp leads. When I switch to 60 amperes I get a beautiful picture, but am still troubled with the double spot, and the arc can be heard all over the house."

Yours is a difficult proposition, Indiana. If you have done the various things you say you have I do not know of anything further to suggest, except that you should have two 7½ inch condenser lenses instead of one 6½, and one 7½. If your arc is unduly noisy on 60 amperes, then there is something wrong with your compensarc. However, you ought not to need 60 amperes on a 12 foot picture. On the other hand 40 is hardly enough. You might cut a little resistance into the secondary circuit, so that you can get 50 amperes from the 60 ampere contact. The ghost, I think, is due to the fact that you are using a condenser combination of too short a focal length. Change to two 7½ lenses and I think there will be improvement.

PUEBLO TROUBLES.—Pueblo, Colorado, sends in a daily paper in which it is set forth that the manager of the Grand Opera House employed a boy to run his machine, claiming there were no unemployed licensed operators. The paper gave the manager in question the names and addresses of two and the secretary of L. U. No. 15 says that whenever the manager gets ready to pay the scale of $20.00 per week there will be plenty of competent operators available. The manager of Pueblo's Grand Opera House is not the only one who employs a boy because a man costs real money. We would humbly suggest that the Grand Opera House being a large theater, if it cannot pay a competent operator as reasonable a scale as $20.00 per week it might better close up. Surely the business can spare the manager who is willing to inflict the work of a kid operator, presumably thoroughly incompetent, on audiences that pay to see a show. The operator is the man who produces the results which bring in the money. Certainly $20.00 a week is not an exorbitant sum to pay the man on whose work depends, absolutely, your box office receipts.

WORN APERTURE.—Peabody, Kan., writes: "My hat is in the ring! My aperture plate wears in the center just above the aperture. Tension is not tight. Machine is a new one. Will send photo of my operating room soon."

By the shape of the aperture plate sketch I see you have a Motiograph machine. I think most likely the wear is caused by one or both of the tension springs being set a little too far in—too close to the aperture. This would cause them to bow the film down against the aperture plate between the tracks. It might also cause an out-of-focus effect. Glad to have the photo.

SIXTY VOLT SUPPLIES.—Millbrook, N. Y., wants to know where supplies for 60 volt light plant may be had. Don't know. Would like that information myself. Sixty volt lamps, fans, etc., can be had, I'm sure—but where?

SALT BRINE, WASHINGTON, IND., writes: "Since the appearance in February 10 issue of an article in which the method of Mr. Gregory, of Baltimore, who soaks his carbons in salt brine, were set forth, I have carefully noted the results reported by other operators who have experimented. Allow me to offer a few suggestions, backed up by knowledge of chemistry acquired many years ago. If I rightly remember Brother Gregory said he soaked his carbons in a solution of salt. By salt I presume he means common table salt. If so, I can hardly see how such carbons could produce a perfectly white light, since common salt is a chemical combination of metallic sodium and chlorine gas. Its chemical name is sodium chloride, and sodium, or any of its salts, when passed through an alcohol or other flame, burns with a yellowish cast. This I know from numerous tests. Now if Brother Gregory used salts (not salt), the whole situation is changed, since salts, as we commonly speak of them (and use them for their purgative qualities) are nothing more than magnesium sulphate—a chemical unity of magnesium and sulphuric acid in some form. As every photographer well knows magnesium burns with an intensely white flame. Possibly that is what Brother Gregory used. So much for the chemical end of the matter. And now for the practical end, which is, after all, what concerns us most. I can state, from the experience acquired in numerous experiments, that the additional brilliancy derived from the use of any of the before mentioned solutions amounts to practically nothing. The saturation of carbons with various solutions is, in a way, the same idea employed in the manufacture of carbons for flaming arc lamps which, by the employment of a metallic core, produce a light of various colors, same being due to vaporizing of the metallic element contained in the carbons. However, whether any of us are right in our arguments, this matter has shown one thing, viz: there are operators who do more than merely operate, in that they are studying out ways and means for bettering their work. In doing this they are helping the whole business. As for myself I am constantly working on ideas of my own. I have perfected an outside shutter for attachment to any Powers 'five' mechanism. Its feature is its simplicity and the fact that with any change of the framing carriage the shutter remains the same. Will send photo of same soon."

Will be glad to have photo of the shutter. As to the brine, it was salt brine strong enough to float an egg. Regardless of what experiments you may have made, and their apparent results, there is something in this salt stunt, as recent letters prove. I have published your words for the reason that it is barely possible that soaking carbons in a strong solution of salts might turn up something valuable. A dime's worth of salts (Epsom salts I take it the brother means) and a little time will tell the tale. Probably there is nothing to it, but it is worth the try anyhow.

EXPLOSION.—Toronto, Can., writes: "Enclosed find clipping from the Toronto World. From it you will discover the fact that films 'explode' in Canada, just the same as in the United States. I think that Noah used water resistance on his arc. Am I right?"

The clipping contains the same old stereotyped chestnut about the film "exploding." As to Noah I refuse to be interviewed. In the end, however, his ark was grounded.

GHOST.—Phillipsburg, Kan., writes: "Use a Powers Six; project a 12-foot picture on an 80-foot throw. Am using two 7½ condensers. The M. P. lens is 6 inch E. F. Use about 30 amperes 110 volt A. C. There is a blue spot in centre of picture. Have my carbons set as you advise in hand book. Have tried other sets but it is still there. What do you mean by double 'spot'?"

Your two 7½-inch lenses are all right. I think you will find the blue spot will disappear if you move your lamphouse back as far as it will go. If not, try other condensers.

The term "double spot" means just what the words imply, viz: two spots, one overlapping the other. It is caused by a reflection from both craters, there being, as you, of course, know, a crater on both carbons with A. C.

STERN BACK FROM CALIFORNIA.

Mr. Julius Stern, general manager of the Imp Films Company, has just returned from a three weeks' stay at Los Angeles, Cal., on business for the company. The California company, which includes E. J. Le Saint, Margarita Fischer, Harry Pollard, Edward Lyons, Louise Crolius, Ben Horning and Eugene Kelley, are engaged in the making of a series of pictures which will transcend in beautiful photographic qualities and dramatic interest all those which have so far been released from the Los Angeles negatives. These have been very popular, having won the favor of the public and the exhibitors on both sides of the Atlantic.

Mr. Stern's work was chiefly directed towards the proper organization of the West Coast Company, which is now in full going order. An early release of the Imp Films Co., the direct result of Mr. Stern's visit, will be a scenic one of Los Angeles, showing the principal features of interest of a city which has been discovered to be an ideal metropolis for moving picture making.

AMERICAN EXTERIORS CREATE COMMENT.

Those film manufacturers who believe that the exhibitor is not keen to notice little touches that add to the beauty of a picture would have been agreeably surprised at the quantity of mail received by the American Film Mfg. Co. since the release of its picture, "From the Four Hundred to the Herd," Mar. 4. Many of these scenes were staged in and around the grounds and gardens of the famous million-dollar hostelry, the Hotel Del Coronado, at San Diego, Cal. No manufacturer could have produced such striking settings in a studio. For those who fancied the big range with its moving cattle, the picture swung to the ranch of the historian Bancroft, whose Western range is considered one of the finest in the country. "The Maid and the Man," released April 1, contains interiors of the same hotel.

"Gypsy Blood"

The First of a Series of Feature Pictures in Which Miss Asta Nielsen Appears.

IN our issue of March 23rd was given an extended review of the work of Miss Asta Nielsen, a celebrated German actress who was induced to appear in a series of feature photoplays by the Deutsches Biograph Company of Berlin, the American rights for which were purchased by the Tournament Film Company, of Toledo, Ohio. The Moving Picture World stated at that time that a mention of these features as they appeared would be given in these columns, the first of them being "Gypsy Blood."

"Gypsy Blood" is a play that deals with two types of life in Europe that are as far removed from each other, in the ordinary course of events, as the two poles. Though custom may raise barriers between royal blood and gypsy blood, both noble and gypsy are human beings, and thereby hangs the tale. It is an interweaving of the affections of a beautiful dark-eyed Gypsy girl with those of the scion of an aristocratic family. Before now, Gypsy blood has upset the calculations of people in high places, and it is more than likely to do so again many times in future. The plot of this story runs as follows:

Baron Korff is the son of a widowed Baroness, both living at Castle Felseck. The young Baron has been bethrothed to the Countess Leonie, an heiress living at an adjoining estate. It had long been their custom to take horseback rides on pleasant mornings and on one of these occasions they come across a lone Gypsy wagon on a country road, the sole occupants of which are Kasper and his daughter Luscha. The young Baron is attracted by the Gypsy girl, to the entire oblivion of the Countess. Taking umbrage at the long continued flirtation, the Countess rides home alone. At a village inn the next day the Baron again meets Luscha where her father is playing cards with some peasants. Kasper loses at cards and orders his daughter, who is a well trained thief, to enter the inn and steal the contents of the cash drawer while he engages the landlord with fanciful tales of adventure. The landlord, however, is not to be caught by any such trick and the girl is taken red handed by him in committing the theft. The Baron arriving at this moment, and seeing the girl about to be taken to prison, offers the inn-keeper a five pound note which is accepted and further proceedings dropped. This gives the Baron a better understanding with the girl, and, following her out of town, he obtains a conversation with her and persuades her to visit him the next evening at the castle.

Well accustomed to stealth, the Gypsy maid arrives without being seen, as appointed, at the chamber denoted by Kroff. This clandestine affair, before it has time to develop, is interrupted by Kasper, the girl's father, who becomes demonstrative. A struggle is soon in progress. Disarmed, the Gypsy is pushed outside of the apartment and expelled from the grounds. During the Baron's absence, Luscha, obeying her thieving instincts, proceeds to rifle the young man's desk and extract therefrom a wallet containing considerable money. The Baron returning is mistrustful, and upon investigation finds that the wallet has been taken. He turns upon the girl and denounces her as a thief. Luscha is devoid of any love or concern for her father, and artfully convinces the young man that Kasper is the thief.

Waking early next morning in the Gypsy camp, Luscha removes the bank notes from the wallet and slips it into the pocket of her sleeping father. When the Baron and police arrive the purse is found upon the Gypsy and his daughter watches him led off to prison without the least compunction. By this means the Gypsy maid has freed herself from her father's domination. She is free to continue her affair with the Baron without interference, which of course she does. It seems to be a real love affair on both sides, for the Baron introduces her to his mother and declares his intention of making the Gypsy his bride. All of this to the very deep mortification of the Countess Leonie, who quits the premises forthwith. For some months following, Luscha attends a boarding school at the expense of the Baron, after which she is considerably improved in manner and ways of living.

On the day of the wedding the festivities are interrupted by Kasper, who breaks into the midst of the assembled guests and wildly exposes his daughter as being a tramp like himself. Kasper is promptly ejected and the wedding proceeds. Eighteen months later a child is born, but not to a very happy pair, for the Baron by this time is thoroughly disillusioned. His wife's low birth has been a social drawback and he finds himself chafing under the conditions, while his affections are leaning once more toward the Countess Leonie. Kroff and Leonie resume their former morning horseback rides.

At this point Kasper again intrudes his presence by informing his daughter of the rides taken by the Baron and the Countess. From this time on the heart of Luscha is filled with a desire for revenge. She departs from the castle with her little boy and leaves false evidence of suicide. Rejoining her father, Luscha passes the next five years of her life as a Gypsy. Finally Kasper is taken ill; they decide to abandon the child near the home of his father. The little one is found at the castle gate by the Countess Leonie and recognized by her. She takes the little fellow to the Baron who is overjoyed at the touch of the small soft arms around his neck, for he had long since given up his boy as dead. Luscha observes this meeting in hiding and when she sees her little son safe in his father's arms she withdraws from the scene, perhaps for good, for there the picture ends.

"HER INDIAN HERO" (Nestor).

"Her Indian Hero" is the title of the Nestor Western to be released on April 17th, 1912. It is decidedly one of the most realistic pictures acted by the Nestor players. George Gebhart, as "Silver Water," the pale-face girl's Indian hero, deserves credit for his portrayal of the red-man, a very trying and difficult character to undertake. Dorothy Davenport, as "Veda Mead," the society girl, shares the honors with Mr. Gebhart in accomplishing the most difficult work in the production. The society girl, although promised to another, is so attracted by the handsome son of the Indian chief that she forgets herself so far as to encourage the Indian's sincere affection for her.

Scene from "Her Indian Hero" (Nestor).

One of the most beautiful scenes in this photo-play is on the veranda of the beautiful home of the girl, after darkness has fallen, when the red-man, clothed in the conventional evening dress of his white brothers, calls to see the white girl he has so long dreamed of and shows the card she had given him with the words, "To My Indian Hero," written across the face of it. It is then that the girl realizes the harm she has wrought and her superb acting and the stolidity of the Indian's countenance, even when he comprehends that she is not for him, is certainly worthy of comment. He stands the blow as his forefathers would have done, without any sign of emotion, but how deeply he is affected can be left to anyone's imagination. And when the hopelessness of it all dawns upon him, he finds his way back to his people, to live their life and forget his white love.

Although George Gebhart and Dorothy Davenport are the chief characters in this splendid drama and most of the credit is due them for the wonderful success of the picture, there are other characters who are deserving of mention. For instance, Victoria Forde, as "Morning Star," the Indian maid, is exceptionally adapted to this difficult part. Jack Conway as "Hal Benton," the fiance of "Veda Mead," certainly makes good in his part, and for a real Indian chief, Mr. Russell Bassett is without equal. There are a few minor characters portrayed, one that is worthy of attention being played by Eugenia Forde, as the mother of "Morning Star."

The scenes and settings have been selected and placed with a true eye for the artistic and the photography is equal, if not superior, to that degree of quality which has long been a feature of the Nestor pictures. This picture is truly worthy of the success that it will undoubtedly command.

"TRUE TILL DEATH" (Melies).

The Melies Company has performed creditable work in this release. A vein of pathos and sincerity runs all through the reel; the plot is a novel one, the scenery does honor to the director who selected it. The story tells of a young girl in war times who through many trials and vicissitudes remained steadfastly true to the memory of her husband. Some extremely interesting and novel features are introduced in the development of the plot and in the final scenes. The picture will be released on April 25th.

Scene from "True Till Death" (Melies).

THE KID STEALS THE KIDLET.

The Thanhouser Kid's gone and done it. She's eloped with her co-star, and sweetheart, the Thanhouser Kidlet. The World was there and snapped the accompanying picture. Note the love-look in their eyes. Of course, since they are in the Thanhouser employ, the elopement was for a film.

Scene from "The Baby Bride" (Thanhouser).

Said film is "The Baby Bride," released Tuesday, April 16th. In it Marie plays a boy who is in love with Baby Helen. Marie's ma is a widow and Helen's pa a widower. Chasing their eloping offspring, the ma and the pa meet—and it's love at the first half-sight. And while Marie doesn't get a hubby or Helen a wife, the former gets a new father and the latter a new mother.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

DOWN AND OUT (Majestic).

The way of the transgressor may be hard, but it is soft in comparison with the way of the stranded actor. Perhaps no creature is more pathetic than the actor when he is down and out, because the average run of actors have no trade to fall back upon.

"Down and Out" is a picture of actor life in a great city, apparently New York, and the scenes are laid exclusively in booking offices and the "actors' boarding house." This picture may be called a comic tragedy, inasmuch as it is funny to look at, but tragic to the characters.

Two actors, one of them a "has-been" and the other a "never-was," jointly occupy a room in an actors' boarding house somewhere up near the roof. Rent had long been overdue and for some time the two had existed entirely upon the love of the landlady's daughter for the younger of the two men. She smuggled them things to eat long after her mother had cut off the source of supplies for the inner man. Day after day they had stood with others of their kind outside the breastworks of the booking office, wherein the booking manager reposed with all the sanctity and seclusion of a king. Their quest was the same that has been given up in hopeless despair by countless thousands in New York in attempting to get a stage engagement. At last they were driven to the desperate expedient of looking for work. The young fellow got a job as valet to a strange gentleman. With the means he managed to get therefrom, he supported his friend; both being meanwhile assisted by the landlady's daughter.

Scene from "Down and Out" (Majestic).

Things looked more hopeless for the old actor, and his lot was indeed a sad one. One day, however, not long after, there came a letter from the agency to the old actor, saying that there was an opportunity, providing he came well dressed and looked the part. He read the letter to his sweetheart and friend, but there were no funds at hand to make the purchase of a better appearance. The young valet, however, was resourceful. A brilliant scheme came into his head. That same day he had taken a suit of clothes to be pressed for his master, knowing that the master had many suits of clothes, and would not miss it.

The suit was a perfect fit and made a beautiful front for the old actor. He presented himself at the booking office railing and received immediate consideration, being summoned to that inner land. There was a shock coming, however, both to the booking agent and the old actor, when the booking agent recognized his own suit of clothes on the fraudulent thespian. By this it will be seen that the younger of the two actors had been working for some time without knowing it for the booking agent; the very man he had been trying to see for months. The valet was promptly called in and asked how the suit of clothes had gotten so far beneath its proper sphere. At this point the two actors realized that the "jig" was up and confessed that they had been pulling off a bluff. The booking agent, being a man who admired a clever fakir, gave them each a contract to sign, and thus ended their troubles for a season.

One of the funniest parts of the picture is the reception of the now "famous" pair at the actors' boarding house. They received the greatest of attention from the landlady and her daughter, which was in great contrast to the treatment they received some days before. "Down and Out" is a very funny picture. The details are worked out with much thought, and the whole plot is decidedly logical. If any comedy can be called a feature then this comedy is a feature.

THE BURGLAR'S REFORMATION (Reliance).

Reforming burglars, under ordinary circumstances, is not indulged in generally, but in this particular instance it was highly justified, and the matter turned out better than could have been expected from the way in which matters became entangled.

A well-bred young man had been courting an heiress who had gotten into the settlement work of the city. He found it difficult to bring matters to a successful close, owing to her great interest in the work. Furthermore, she had an idea that he was courting her only for the sake of her money. It was up to him to convince her to the contrary. Fortunately for the young man an opportunity was quickly forthcoming. That night, as he returned home late, he became aware of the presence of a burglar in the house. By skillful maneuvering he got the drop on the burglar, and the situation put an idea into his head. His sweetheart was reforming criminals, why could he not also reform this burglar? Reforming a burglar would surely be a great feat in the eyes of his sweetheart.

He put the proposition to the burglar and the burglar accepted. Although sorely tempted many times thereafter to do more thieving, those desires were conquered by himself, and in due time he was introduced into the family of the young man's sweetheart. The sweetheart had a younger brother who was wayward, and particularly addicted to gambling, at which game he was constantly fleeced. In order to recoup his losses this young fellow made a secret raid on the safe of his father, but the reformed burglar happened to be watching him from an alcove and stopped the boy from doing what he was about. He took the money from the lad, intending to return it to the safe, but others coming in at that time, he was obliged to put it hastily into his own pocket in order to shield the boy. The old man smelled a rat somewhere and went apprehensively to his safe, where he became aware of the loss.

Scene from "The Burglar's Reformation" (Reliance).

The reformed burglar at once came under suspicion; the old man was pessimistic and lost no time in branding him as a hopeless case and a born thief. The unfortunate man took it all without a word for the sake of the boy. The money was found in the ex-burglar's pocket. He was being led away to the prison when the real thief came forward and confessed his act. This changed matters considerably. The principal result of it was that it earned for the young lover the hand of his sweetheart, and respect from her father that he had not received before.

Mr. Walthal, as the burglar, has the leading part, which he plays in the most convincing way. It is a well told story, full of interest at every turn of the handle, written by Mr. George Terwilliger.

"THE RANGE DETECTIVE" (American).

Bandits terrorized the Great Horn ranch. They could not be apprehended by local authorities, apparently, so the old sheriff called for help. The bandits flung themselves on a stage coach that morning, robbed the mail and divided the spoil among themselves.

One day a handsome, slim and dapper young man drove to the Great Horn ranch. He sold saddles, he said, and tried to induce the ranch owner to buy. Here he met Clara Williams, the ranch-owner's daughter, with whom he chatted about the recent hold-ups. Departing, he espied the ranch foreman, an evil-looking fellow, with several of his friends, take their horses and ride away. The casual observer would have been surprised to see the transformation that occurred as soon as the saddle-salesman found himself among the trees. Off came mustache and tight-fitting trousers and the next moment he appears as an ordinary ranch-hand in chaps and mounted on the back of his former buggy-horse.

Scene from "The Range Detective" (American).

Following carefully, he saw the ranch foreman and his pals drive to a small hut. There he watched them distribute some recent spoil, and having satisfied himself drove back to the Great Horn ranch. He was chatting with Clara when they drove up and did not see the foreman open his satchel and disclose to view an ominous-looking star pinned to the shirt. Clara and the erstwhile saddle-salesman parted, Clara going to the woods on an errand. Here she was suddenly seized by the foreman and his coterie, gagged, bound and thrown across a horse. Two minutes later the saddle-salesman found himself similarly tied and lying in the bush. Thus he lay when the old sheriff found him.

Gathering a posse was but short work. Locating the outlaw gang in the little hut, they promptly gave battle and a desperate fight took place. It raged until the foreman was shot, and, without their leader, the outlaws surrendered. Then the saddle-salesman showed his star and soon discovered that Clara showed no preference for vocation.

"LONESOME MISS WIGGS" (Imp).

Miss Wiggs was determined to cheat Fate, for Fate had so far in her life ordained that her greatest happiness was to be derived from the constant company of her pet parrot. Cats and parrots pall at times even on old maids. A man around the house is, after all is said and done, a more companionable asset than the members of the lower world. He can be talked at, or to, and cannot talk back. So Miss Wiggs advertises discreetly for a husband, holding out a cash consideration. Such a bait, of course, was bound to get a quick nibble. And the nibble came from an unhappy widower who was in financial straits. So Miss Wiggs and her would-be husband met, and the two had a whole series of exciting adventures before each subsided to where he and she started out from. Frankly, Miss Wiggs was so markedly lacking in her personal attractions that the widower thought her dear at the price, and he sought other means of relieving himself of his financial difficulties.

Scene from "Lonesome Miss Wiggs (Imp).

The plot is carried through by a series of diverting and intricate situations which give John R. Cumpson an opportunity of doing some clever pieces of acting.

SELIG CO. SCOOPS OTHERS ON PICTURES OF THE MAINE.

The Selig Polyscope Co. have once more demonstrated the efficiency of their organization and their ability to choose winners in the way of Topical Releases. On April 3d, they released a full reel special entitled "The Last Rites of the Maine and the Burial of Its Dead." This film is said to be one of the finest of its kind ever secured. It was produced under the official auspices of the U. S. Navy Department. Selig camera men were present in Havana during the process of raising the ill-fated battleship and the scenes which they secured were most excellent.

These camera men stayed in Havana during the entire program of ceremonies and, in addition to this, Selig camera men were stationed upon the government battleships which attended the sinking of the Maine and transferring of its dead. Among the excellent scenes which are shown in this interesting subject are: The Maine as it appeared when it was raised, building the water-tight bulkheads, various views of the wreckage, the wreck being floated, dredging openings in the coffer-dam, so that wreck could be towed out to sea; removal of coffins from the City Hall at Havana, transporting coffins to the North Carolina, loading the coffins and flowers at wharf and in harbor, towing the Maine to its final resting place, and the greatest scene of all—the sinking of the Maine.

The Selig Special Maine Release was prepared, advertised, and released in one week's time.

FIREPROOF EQUIPMENT.

The New York Fireproof Construction Co., 43 East 21st Street, has installed the new asbestos fireproof booths in Loew's Circle Theater, Manhattan Opera House, Shubert Theater, Gaiety Theater, at 49th Street and Third Avenue, and the Nicoland, 76th Street and Third Avenue.

Besides handling asbestos booths, the New York Fireproof Construction Co. has a complete line of approved fire appliances, and demonstrations are requested.

"THE DOCTOR" (Essanay).

For the month of April the Essanay Company releases eight clever comedy conceits that are top-notchers for pure fun and strings of hearty laughs. The reputation of Essanay was first established on bright comedies, the Chicago studio being well known to exhibitors throughout the country as "the home of comedy hits." This reputation has never been allowed to become tarnished, and is steadily mounting to a height that promises joy to showmen who feature comic bills and hilarious reels of mirth.

"The Doctor," a comedy feature from the famous Essanay Company, is cleverly original both in plot and production. Doctor May Killham, a stunning lady physician, is the object of much attention and adoration on the part of a number of male guests in a fashionable hotel.

One evening Howard Missimer, an impressionable young chap, meets Doctor Killham and is instantly smitten with her. To strike up an acquaintance he feigns illness and collapses in his pal's arms. Doctor Killham is called, diagnoses the case and orders the boys to take Howard to his room. Here she doses him with some medicine and excuses the boys, who leave in supreme disgust at the success of Missimer's ruse. Next morning Howard calls on Doctor Killham, settles his bill and receives her business card and permission to call Thursday afternoon—her birthday.

Scene from "The Doctor" (Essanay).

Howard meets his three pals and shows them May's card with the address of her office, 42 Long Acre Building. Instantly all three of the boys contract terrible diseases and sneak out bound for her office. Dr. May relieves them of her fee, while they try to make desperate love to her, but fail to make a great impression.

May now decides to invite all the boys to the office on her birthday and accordingly mails the invitations. Thursday afternoon arrives and May is astonished when the expressman delivers a number of birthday gifts from the boys. An hour later the four boys call, each one with a bouquet. Naturally they come one at a time and each is disgusted at seeing the others. However, May tells them they can all be jolly good fellows and brings out a bottle of good wine.

In the midst of the merriment a sudden knock is heard at the door and a messenger boy enters with a telegram for May. She opens it, reads with horror-stricken face, hastily excuses herself to the boys and rushes into an inner office. A moment later she comes out dressed for traveling, tells the boys she has been called away and for them to stay and take charge of the office. With a hasty good-bye, she is gone. Missimer picks up the crumpled telegram from the floor and the boys get a glimpse of the following:

> Dr. May Killham,
> 42 Long Acre Bldg.,
> Come home at once. Your husband and four children have the smallpox.
> (Signed) Mother.

For a moment the boys gaze into each other's faces; then they break into a hearty laugh at the way they have been stung by the much-married doctor. Miss Eleanor Blanchard is captivating in the role of "Dr. Killham," and the other parts are splendidly rendered by Howard Missimer, John Steppling, Mr. Wolf, Mr. Barrow and Mr. Ferris. The production is booked for release April 25th.

WHERE THEY GOT THE DESERT.

Hush! another studio secret is out! "Into the Desert," a Thanhouser story released Friday, April 19th, contains some Arabian desert scenes that are the most really-truly in a long while. But they just couldn't be Arabia, since Miss Snow and the Messrs. Cruze and Russell, who have the "leads," haven't been out of this country for "y'ars and y'ars." So the Thanhouser Company yield the World the secret—'twas made in Florida, U. S. A. And herewith is a snapshot of a big moment on the Arabian-Floridan desert!

Scene from "Into the Desert" (Thanhouser).

"WOMAN ALWAYS PAYS" (Imp).

The acting in this picture is of an intensely dramatic nature. It is inspired by the theme, which is dramatic, almost tragic, from the start of the film to its finish. In the woman character, Asta Nielsen has a splendid medium for her inimitable art. The services of this lady are so much in request as a moving picture actress that she recently turned down a lucrative offer from this country to come and pose in American-made pictures.

The story, as already told, is that of a beautiful girl who is lured from conventional society life by the attractions of circus life and the glare of the footlights. She has a passion for a worthless mountebank, who exercises a terrible hypnotic influence over her. He and she descend slowly but surely in the social scale, and the picture ends with the catastrophe of the woman ridding herself of the man by fatal means. The last effort of reclamation has failed—so the woman pays for her inconstancy.

The moral of the story is, of course, clear, and it is to be hoped will be convincing. It is that, after all, the proprieties of life must not be violated; otherwise, Nemesis is sure to follow.

The settings are picturesque in the extreme. They show town and country life in Denmark and some beautiful photographic effects are secured. The leading actors in the cast are all fine artists, who act with thoroughness and conviction. Miss Nielsen herself, is piquant and tragic by turns. She is animated and temperamental and has the supreme faculty of acting with her face. She is a thinking as well as a performing actress.

"Woman Always Pays" is to be released on Thursday, April 18th. It has excited so much interest in film circles in the United States that it is bound to be enormously popular.

"SAVED BY A CAT" (Solax).

The Cat	"Pussy" Solax

When Detective Harper finds himself closed in on all sides by automatic doors and by an iron-barred and grated window, with steel shutters, he decides that at last his career as a trained criminal detector had come. He was trapped for the first time in his career. He knew that the desperate gang of criminals, whom he almost had in the toils of the law for robbing a wealthy merchant, would stop at nothing in order that he may be put out of their way.

While in this contemplative mood, a cat comes to the window-sill and takes her station outside the iron-grating. Harper, who had learned to think quickly, rapidly writes a note, ties it around the neck of the cat, pets the pussy and then sends her off, hoping that the note will attract attention and bring help.

In the meanwhile the gang decides to asphyxiate Harper. The detective later sees the steel shutters of the small prison window close in air-tight. He begins to smell the inrush of gas. He struggles in vain to free himself from the awful place. Gradually he begins to lose consciousness. Harper struggles until he falls to the floor unconscious. The cat, in the meanwhile, goes to her old maid mistress and, of course, the old maid comes to the rescue with the police. The detective is revived.

FATE WON THE RACE.

If you were up in the Klondike, working like—well, working like tarnation, for a girl, and you broke your leg and were nursed in the camp of an Indian, and many, many months had passed, and the girl had worried and worried, and sent and searched for you, and, thinking you had forgotten, promised another, and you returned just in time to see her marry the other—what would happen to you? The Rex Company presents this gripping situation in its release of Sunday, April 14th, "The Seal of Time." Marion Leonard is the girl—which makes it all the more interesting. To make a short story stay that way, remember the title and date.

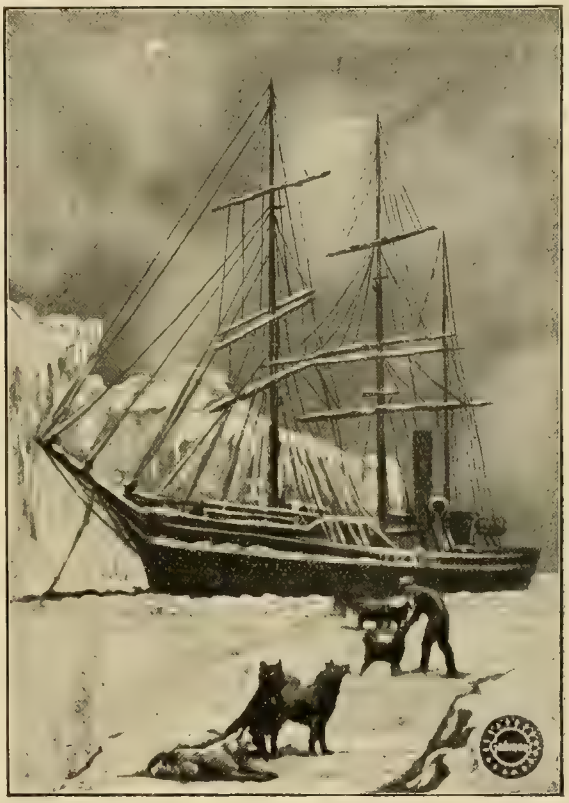
CAPT. SCOTT PICTURES GIVEN IMPETUS.

The Sedeg Feature Film Company has indeed brought over from the other side the most timely of all feature subjects in this "Capt. Scott's South Pole Expedition" in two reels. Nothing proves the topical qualities of this picture more conclusively than the publicity which Capt. Scott, the hero of this film, received this week in all the newspapers of the United States, as well as the rest of the world.

The various publications had been long in wait for the first moment when word would be received from the intrepid explorer, and in so much as this intelligence was received on Monday, April 1st, every newspaper throughout the country flooded its columns announcing that Scott was now wintering 150 miles distant from the Antarctic pole itself.



Poster for Captain Scott's South Pole Expedition Pictures.

The New York Herald has been featuring the pictures of Scott's Antarctic trip, loaned through the courtesy of the Sedeg Feature Film Company. They have furthermore contributed a full page to the details of the wonders of this film in their Sunday, April 7th, edition, giving several exclusive views that could only be seen by those who witness the two-reel production itself.

States are being taken up by bidders throughout the Union and prices far above the ones which ordinarily hold good for two-reel subjects are being offered. The accompanying illustrations give a representation of a few of the advantages of the Sedeg Feature Film Company's timely offer.

H. C. SIMERAL BACK FROM THE ROAD.

The Champion Film Company's hustling business-getter, Mr. H. C. Simeral, dropped into his offices on Saturday last, to file his report on the orders he scooped for Champion throughout the country. His trip took him as far as Calgary, Alberta, but it proved successful, though Calgary is some jaunt from New York. According to Mr. Simeral, the general tone of the Independent business is very satisfying, which of course bodes good things for Mark Dintenfass, the pilot of the Champ outfit.

GAUMONT TIPS.

The latest thing the Gaumont Company has to offer comes in the form of a new combination, "The Gaumont Series," explained as follows: Every other Sunday is to witness the release of a hand-colored feature, while every third Thursday is to see a two-reel dramatic subject placed upon the market. The remaining Sundays are to be devoted to black and white dramatic subjects, while the remaining Thursdays will be Gaumont comedy days.

Among the most important and spectacular films that this European concern is placing upon the market is their Sunday, April 28, release of "Heliogabalus, Tyrant of Rome." This is another Gaumont lion picture, and portrays in full realism the ferocity and profligacy of the era in which Heliogabalus, Emperor of Rome, ruled the Tiber City, in the years 218-222 B. C. The picture also reveals the story of this monarch whose name was made famous to history by throwing a fierce group of lions down upon his senators whom he had assembled at a banquet, It is one of the strongest historical dramas that has ever been attempted.

"The Lost Ring" is the hand-colored drama slated for appearance on May 12. Its atmosphere is decidedly that in which Maupassant couches his imperishable tales.

The first two-reel subject that Gaumont will place upon the market is entitled "The Fate of Mothers" and portrays with touching vividness a story of family life.

Still later, probably toward the end of this month, the exhibitor is promised "Written in Blood," a three-reel subject, the unusual and stirring nature of which excited the European continent upon its release, as has no other plural reel offering.

WARNER FEATURES.

Warner reports "Redemption" is going fast. He is being kept on the jump answering the many inquiries received in the past few days. The next release will be ready April 15th, "The Glass Coffin," in three reels, by Eclair Co. This is a story that will appeal to the picture-going public. Watch for full details in next week's issue.

What Others Say:

The Moving Picture World:—

"It (Miss Asta Nielsen's name) stands on a par with that of Julia Marlowe in this country or with Sarah Bernhardt's name in France. . . . She possesses all the talents and abilities of Miss Marlowe, Mrs. Patrick Campbell and Madame Bernhardt ROLLED INTO ONE."

The Kineto, London, Eng.:—

"Miss Asta Nielsen is without doubt the most gifted actress who has ever entered the arena of kinematography, and it is admitted that her acting in the marvelous film 'Gypsy Blood' will only enhance the already phenomenal reputation she enjoys."

The Imp Films Co.:—

"We seriously predict that it (Asta Nielsen film) will be even a bigger money maker for the exhibitors of America than any you have ever had. Miss Asta Nielsen is now regarded as the Greatest Moving Picture Actress in the World—barring none."

VITAGRAPH.

THE PIPE (April 15).—Dingley's girl won't marry him because he smokes. He disposes of his pipes, cigars and cigarettes, saying if she will have him he will never smoke again. His self-denial causes him untold agony. On his wedding day he receives presents of cigars, tobacco, pipes, smoking jackets and everything which goes with a complete smoker's outfit.

A few days later a friend sends him a present of a fine pipe, accompanied by a note, which he tries to hide from his wife. She becomes suspicious and employs "Sherlie Homes," the detective, to find out what ails her husband. He comes to the house and finds the pipe which Dingley has hidden; also the note. His "sleuthship" divines the cause of her husband's queer notions, and, when he enters the room, "Sherlie Homes" directs the wife to follow his instructions and her husband will be all right again. He tells her to fill Dingley's pipe with tobacco, light it, and allow him to have the privilege of smoking in his own home as much as possible. Dingley becomes himself again, his wife is the happiest little woman on earth.

THE CAVE MAN (April 16).—Aleric, making his way across the mountains with his young daughter, Chloe, suddenly loses his foothold and drops to his death upon the rocks below.

Dagban and Eric, two brothers find the girl and take her to their cave. Dagban claims her as his own by right of might. Eric wins her with his gentleness and love. Else, the boys' mother, looks upon Chloe as a trouble-maker. Dagban threatens to do her bodily harm unless she accedes to his attentions. Eric protects Chloe; a violent quarrel follows in which Eric strikes Dagban to the ground. To avoid conflict and lest he be a further obstacle to his brother's desire for Chloe, he leaves his home. After Eric has gone, Chloe follows, declares her love for him and he for her. Together they continue their journey, seeking happiness in the land beyond the horizon, which joins earth with heaven.

WORKING FOR HUBBY (April 17).—Henry and Brown, two business men occupying offices next to each other, are in need of a stenographer. Their wives call on them and find their husbands upset because they cannot handle their correspondence. Each offers to do her husband's stenographic work. The men refuse to entertain the suggestion. The two men are well acquainted; the two women have never met until they come across each other at the foot of the elevator, on entering the building. Mrs. Henry and Mrs. Brown meet again on leaving the building, tell the nature of their husband's business troubles and become interested in each other.

Henry and Brown compare notes. They place "ads" in the paper. Mrs. Henry and Mrs. Brown see the advertisements. Mrs. Henry applies for the position at Brown's and Mrs. Brown for the position at Henry's. Both are engaged. The men meet again to compare notes. Brown says he "has a peach" and Henry says "he has a daisy." Brown tells of a date with his at "Shamley's and Henry at "Rester's" for supper. They become very curious. Brown takes a look into Henry's office and discovers his wife working for Henry. Brown is frantic, rushes back into his office, followed by Henry and Mrs. Brown. There Henry discovers Mrs. Henry working for Brown. They all enjoy a good laugh. Brown and Henry each adjust matters by employing his own wife and everything goes along swimmingly.

THE CRAVEN (April 19).—Harvey Fiske, with an inherent streak of cowardice, is a newcomer at Childs' ranch. He introduces himself to Mr. Childs, his niece Anne, and Tom Beckett. Tom bears a silent love for Anne; she admires young Fiske. Harvey asks her to marry him and gains the consent of her uncle.

After their marriage, the Mexican, who threatened Fiske, returns and demands a loan of fifty dollars from him, which he grants, plainly showing he is afraid to refuse. The "Greaser" again threatens him. Anne defies him and drives him from the house. His fellow citizens elect Fiske sheriff. He is told a bandit is lurking in the vicinity whom he must arrest at once. Fiske is seized with fear and refuses to go. Anne's suppressed feeling of contempt arouses her to a determination to hide her husband's "yellow streak" by taking the bandit herself. She runs him down and in exchange of shots, kills him, and makes her husband take the dead man to town, claiming for himself the capture of the robber. His friends and neighbors are proud of him. Anne, in a state of collapse, watches from her home the honor which she has brought to her husband, rather than have a blot upon the escutcheon of her family.

WAY OF A MAN WITH A MAID (April 20).—"True love," like Willis Bland's, does not count cost nor consequences; nothing is too good for Elma Ransom, to whom he is paying attention. He is generous to a fault. Even Elma's little brothers share his generosity, he extending his kindnesses most liberally. Elma grows tired of his continued devotion and acts bored and indifferent. Willis' eyes are suddenly opened and he changes his tactics. "Absence makes the heart grow fonder." He stays away from Elma for a whole month, and doesn't even 'phone or write her. She grows anxious and unhappy. When she telephones him, he refuses to answer, instructing his valet to take the message, saying: "Willis is too busy to answer." Elma meets him in an ice-cream parlor with his sister; she thinks she has a rival. He spreads a report that he is going abroad. She requests him to call and say good-bye. He does so and bids her farewell. In reply to Elma's request to write her Willis says 'he fears he will be too busy."

He leaves the room. When he has gone Elma breaks down. He returns to get his gloves which he has purpposely left on the table, and finds her in tears. Believing that she has learned a wholesome lesson, he places his arms tenderly about her waist, lifting her from her chair, asking her why she is crying. She replies by looking into his eyes and asking him to forgive her for her coldness. He does so.

CINES.

HOW THEY LOST OUT (April 16.)—Three estimable sisters, Edith, Mary, and Lucy, quarrel with their respective suitors, and end by simultaneously breaking their engagements. Not long afterward a telegram announces the coming of a friend, George Picard, an eligible young man of great wealth. The girls welcome their guest with the greatest cordiality, and, their inclination for domesticity not having abated in the least, each one expects to make the best of her opportunity.

Suspecting their designs, George invents a story of the loss of his fortune, which has the expected result. Believing him poor, they insist that he dine in the kitchen with the "help."

One of the "help" happens to be a poor cousin of the family, who is a charming creature, and quickly captivates George. He tells her that his reported poverty is a falsehood, and that he offers her the heart of a very rich man.

The girl consents, and the two go into the parlor to announce their engagement, to the astonishment and chagrin of the family.

QUEEN ELIZABETH'S RING (April 20).—The capricious Queen Elizabeth presents her favorite, Lord Leigh, with a ring, saying that if ever he is in trouble he should send the ring to her, and she would aid him.

Lord Leigh scorns the admiration of the Countess of Southerville, and secretly courts Bessie, a poor wench. The countess learns of this affair, and sends word to his noble Lordship that she is about to inform the Queen.

Fearing Her Majesty's displeasure, he impetuously joins a conspiracy against her life, but is discovered, arrested, and thrown into the Tower of London.

There he remembers the Queen's promise, and sends a friend to deliver the ring to Elizabeth. But, unfortunately, it falls into the hands of the jealous Countess, who revengefully conceals it.

Soon afterward, the Countess repents of her action, and delivers the ring, but it is now too late. Lord Leigh has paid for his treason with his head.

ECLIPSE.

THE UNKNOWN TRAVELER (April 17).—Before sailing for the fishing banks of Newfoundland, Louis, a brave sailor lad, bids a tender farewell to his beloved Jean, the innkeeper's daughter, and receives from her a scapular, which is to keep him from all harm.

Months pass and no message is received from the young sailor, and finally a report is circulated that the good ship is lost with all on board. One evening a stranger stops at the inn, requesting food and lodging. He wears a belt filled with gold, and before retiring intrusts it to the innkeeper's care. During the night the temptation is too great for the old man, and he is about to take the treasure, when his daughter discovers him and angrily reproaches her father.

When the stranger appears the next morning, Jean returns the money safely to him, but in doing so catches sight of the scapular about his neck. She recognizes it as her gift, and penetrating his disguise, is soon in the arms of her beloved Louis.

ESSANAY.

THE CLUE (April 16).—Kathleen Nesbit, a clerk in a department store, is the only support of a sick mother. Coming out of a drug store one day, Kathleen aids an old man who has fallen on the sidewalk. She supports him to his lodgings, then goes on to her work. Several weeks later the old man, Karl Linden by name, runs across Kathleen at her counter and, grateful for her former kindness, writes a will upon his cuff, bequeathing her all his possessions. A few days later Kathleen receives a letter from a lawyer advising her of Linden's sudden death and that she is the beneficiary of his will. The old man's belongings are brought to her home, and she finds there is nothing of value except an old clothes chest, a battered watch and several small trinkets. More misfortune falls upon her, for she is late for work and is discharged by the floorwalker of her department. To make matters worse, the doctor now tells her she must send her mother away to a warmer climate or she will die. Kathleen has no money and is at her wits' end. Rummaging through the old clothes chest of Linden's she suddenly comes upon a document filled with strange scrawls that resemble Chinese writing. Slowly folding the paper, Kathleen suddendly starts, for there in plain writing, made by the joining of a number of hieroglyphics, she reads: FALSE BOTTOM IN CHEST. With a cry of joy she seizes a hatchet, rips out the false bottom from the old clothes chest and finds a fortune in bonds and money. Linden has played a strange trick, but nevertheless has rewarded her richly and the days of poverty for her and her mother are at an end.

SAM SIMPKINS, SLEUTH (April 18).—Sam Simpkins, a young rube, pays a visit to a phrenologist who, after carefully examining the various bumps on Sam's head, tells him he is a born detective. Filled with enthusiasm, Sam takes up a correspondence course in detective work and graduates with high honors. He now goes to the city and prepares to rid the place of criminals both large and small. He sees a newspaper ad offering rewards of $25 apiece for the capture of crooks. He answers the ad and receives three photographs and a letter telling him to get busy. Sam now proceeds to scour the streets and finally ropes in a tough specimen, identifies him by one of the photos and lands him in jail. Thinking he recognizes another crook in the company of two women, Sam tries to arrest him, but the women drive him away with their hat-pins. Sam is determined and finally trails another tough specimen, identifies him by the last photo and takes him to the station. Elated with success, Sam wires the agency he has captured the two crooks and waits for his rewards. But his joy is soon cut short, for a return wire is sent him saying the three photos were all pictures of the same crook taken in different poses, and that he "is a blamed fool." Sam is about to give up sleuthing in disgust when he receives word from the police captain saying one of the toughs has been badly wanted for some time and, in reward for Sam's capture of the crook, offers him a place on the force. Naturally, Sam acepts with alacrity.

THE RIVALS (April 19).—John Porter, at his death, leaves his little baby girl, Mary, who is adopted into the family of old Captain Allen and his wife. Sixteen years later Mary has grown into a beautiful girl, ignorant of the fact that she is an adopted child and believing the Allens to be her parents. Her dearest friend and chum is Eva Hartman, a pretty girl, and the two are inseparable. One day, while out skating, they meet Frank Garrison, a handsome fellow, who aids Mary in removing her skates. Both Mary and Eva fall in love with him, but Frank plainly shows that it is Mary he cares for and Eva becomes jealous of her dear friend. One day Mary receives a note from Frank saying he is coming the next evening to take her and Eva to a fancy bress ball. The girls are delighted and go up in the attic to rummage among some old trunks for costumes to wear. Here it is that Eva suddenly comes across an old letter written to the Allens by Porter and agreeing to the adoption of Mary into the Allen home. Filled with jealous rage that Mary, an outcast, should be the favored one in Frank's eyes, Eva determines on revenge. Next evening when Frank calls, Eva shows him the letter, thinking he will naturally turn from Mary on learning she is an adopted child. But Frank shows his manhood, calls in the Allens, reveals Eva's jealousy and declares he intends to make Mary his wife. Humiliated and ashamed, Eva begs Mary's forgiveness, then silently steals from the house, leaving Mary in Frank's protecting arms.

THE CATTLE KING'S DAUGHTER (April 20).—May Barclay, returning from the East, is met at the station by her father, a wealthy cattle king. On passing the town saloon, two members of Buck Brady's gang, known and feared throughout the country for lawless depredations, see May and determine to steal her and hold her for ransom. The two ruffians now decoy old Barclay from the ranch by means of a fake warning that sheep-men are cutting his fences, then gain entrance to the ranch house, find May alone and unarmed, force her to sign a note advising her father she is being held for ransom, then conduct her to their rendezvous. Leaving her on a rough pallet, they depart. Worn out and weary, May is on the point of falling into an exhausted sleep, when she suddenly hears faint cries coming from an adjoining room. Entering, she finds Buck Brady, who is tossing in delirium on a bunk and moaning for water. She discovers he is wounded in the head, secures some water, relieves his pain and restores him to consciousness. Amazed at seeing the pretty girl, Brady questions her and learns of her abduction by his men. Realizing what she had done for him, Brady experiences a change of heart and asks to be allowed to escort her to her home. Meanwhile, Barclay and the sheriff are searching the hills for her. Out on the trail May suddenly spies her father down in a ravine, calls to him, then runs ff, leaving Brady standing gazing after her longingly. For a moment he watches, sees her safe in her father's strong arms, then turns and makes his way slowly back over the rocks with a song of joy in his awakened heart and realizing he has done one decent thing in all his crime-stained career.

KALEM.

WAR'S HAVOC (April 15).—News of Sumter's fall interrupts the wedding of Capt. Faulkner and Jennie McPherson. The ceremony is completed, however, and the dashing young Confederate leaves for the front.

A year later Faulkner and his regiment are quartered near his old home. The Confederates are just making camp when word is received that the Federals are on their way by rail. Hundreds of bluecoats, loaded on flat cars, are speeding to attack the enemy, and the Southerners beat a hasty retreat.

Mrs. Faulkner, by supreme strategy, secures information of value to her husband. Mammy Fanny, a faithful negro slave, succeeds in carrying the message by a clever ruse, and Faulkner arranges a code of signals with his wife. The daring woman is then able to inform Faulkner of the departure of the Federals. She cuts the wires and the Northern operator attempts to send his warning from an instrument which he carries to a tree, but a shot from Mrs. Faulkner's pistol brings him to the ground. The incomplete message, however, furnishes a clew to the operator up the line. He stops the engine, gives the warning and bids the Federals speed backwards on the train.

When the brave wife finds her plans being frustrated, she decides to make a strenuous effort to prevent the arrival of the train load of Federals. She and Mammy Fanny come to the track, where another locomotive is standing. At the point of their pistols they force the fireman to take to the woods and the engineer is made to drive the engine ahead.

Soon the locomotive dashes on to a high trestle. The oncoming train bearing the enemy is steaming toward them. The engineer is forced to leap for his life and the two women jump into the water, thirty feet below. With a crash the two locomotives come together and the brave women have saved the day.

As the sun goes down, the victorious flag of the Confederates floats over the home and Faulkner is happily reunited with his wife.

THE ADVENTURES OF AMERICAN JOE (April 17).—Joseph Chapman, known in Southern California as Jose de Ingles, is shipwrecked and picked up by Bouchard, the pirate, who forces the young man to join the crew. As they approach the shore, the pirate instructs Joe to go inland, look over the Ortega Ranch and make an effort to locate the reputed treasures.

Joe meets the daughter of Ortega and warns her of the pirates' plan to attack and rob her father. Bouchard hears of Joe's treachery and swears vengeance, but the young American, once free from the privateers, succeeds in driving them from the country.

Joe having decided to stay with the Ortegas, institutes many progressive measures and builds the first mill in California. But he was not destined to live in peace. Bouchard's spy, disguised as a beggar, visits the ranch, discovers Joe's popularity and the prosperous condition of the locality, and hastens to inform his chief.

Smarting under his previous defeat, Bouchard plans to even matters with the American, whom he decoys and makes a prisoner. Guadalupe, the pretty daughter of Ortega, learns of the capture of "American Joe" and effects his rescue, after a strenuous attack on the privateers' stronghold.

THE TRAIL OF GOLD (April 10).—Mary, a young Western girl, lived with her old grandfather, who was fast failing in health. In fact the young doctor, Mary's sweetheart, stated that a sudden shock would cause the old gentleman to pass away and he must be kept quiet. During one of the doctor's visits, the grandfather disclosed the hiding place of two bags of gold dust, which he said would become the property of the young couple.

From the window, Tony, a Mexican, overheard the conversation and determined to secure possession of the treasure. As the doctor started from the room, the grandfather was taken with a severe pain in the head. The doctor returned and placing medicine upon his handkerchief, gently adjusted the bandage over the invalid's forehead.

In the dead of night Tony entered the house and took the gold. As he was leaving the old man saw him and endeavored to interfere. The Mexican fled, however, and in his death struggle the grandfather dislodged the handkerchief and thrust it into his mouth.

In his flight Tony stumbled and tore a hole in one of the sacks. He did not notice that a fine trail of gold dust was left behind him.

Next day Mary discovered the robbery and was horrified to find that her grandfather had passed away. The sheriff and his men were summoned and Tony, who joined the group, was the first to call attention to the doctor's handkerchief, which had apparently gagged the old man. The doctor was arrested, despite Mary's protests.

As Mary returned home, broken-hearted, after an ineffectual appeal to the officers, she discovered a scattering of gold dust in the road. She followed the trail to Tony's shack and found him in the act of hiding the stolen mineral. Hastening to the jail, Mary secured the aid of the officials. The cowardly Mexican was brought to prison and the abused doctor was liberated.

LUBIN.

THE REFORMATION OF KID HOGAN (April 8). Kid Hogan is a claimant for the light weight championship. His sweetheart, Nell Simpson, a factory girl, begs him to give up the fight game and settle down to some steady business, but Hogan indignantly refuses and continues in his way. He has a big fight on hand and wins out with "200 Bucks." Full of pride he bursts into Nell's room to find her weeping over the body of her mother, which lays dead upon the bed. The situation is too strained and the poor girl, in a towering rage, orders Hogan from the house. The next day he got drunk and kept it up as long as the $200 lasted. One night he mixed in the crowd listening to the Salvation Army. His bleary eyes could scarcely recognize the faces in the semi-darkness, but one girl impressed him and he pleaded for help. It was his old sweetheart, now Captain Nell Simpson. She took him in hand and soon brought about the reformation of Kid Hogan.

A PIE WORTH WHILE (April 10).—Jack Chalmers, foreman of the Woodward ranch, has trouble with two men in his employ. After repeated warnings he finally discharges Tom and Joe for ill-treatment to horses. The ranch owner asks the foreman what the trouble was. He tells the owner to pay them off. The ranch owner then gives a check to the foreman instructing him to go to the bank for some money. Jack mounts his horse and leaves for the bank. His horse becomes lame. Jack dismounts and leads the wounded animal to the village blacksmith, where he leaves it and starts to walk to town. The two men discover Jack about to enter the bank. They quickly plan to get even for the loss of their positions by holding up Jack, taking the money and leaving the country. Their plans in this direction are thwarted by the timely arrival of Helen, Jack's fiancée. Again Jack encounters the men when about to leave Helen at her gate. The suspicious actions of the men at the bank and their presence at her home, causes Helen to fear for Jack's safety. Although the brave foreman only laughs at Helen's fears, to humor her, he enters the house where from a side window the strange actions of the men quickly confirm her suspicions. Leaving his employer's money in Helen's care he decides to continue on his way. The two men see him leaving the house and follow. On a lonely road, Jack is held up and not finding the money on him, he is allowed to go after being ill-treated and warned by the men. Jack overhears the men planning to return to Helen's in search of the money, and rushing to a neighbor's he quickly warns Helen by wire. Helen seeing the men returning, and realizing her own danger rushes to the kitchen where her mother is making pies. Helen quickly strikes a plan and calling on mother to bolt the door she takes up a pie pan, places the money in it and covering it with a layer of pastry, places it in the stove, just as the men are seen going past the window. Jack arrives with posse headed by his neighbor friend. The men are overpowered and arrested. A happy reunion is made complete by Jack's money being returned to him in the form of a pie worth while.

THAT CHICKEN DINNER (April 11).—A number of tramps were sitting talking on the edge of a wood, when their attention was attracted by Rummy George, running into their midst and displaying a chicken he had just obtained in some manner. At the sight of the fowl they were all struck with the same idea: that they have a feast. Upon the suggestion of George, they started at once to procure the necessary food for the banquet. By stopping at various gates and back doors and meeting many good ladies who took pity on their appearance, they soon had victuals enough to make a good meal. They all return to the roost and show various articles of food they have had given them, and at once start to prepare the feast. While they are thus engaged the constable of the village comes upon them. Seeing what they are at, he immediately goes to some of his good neighbors and pressing them into service, forms an impromptu posse. He drills them in the manual of arms and with shotguns and revolvers they proceed to the spot where the tramps are, to drive them away. The tramps have just seated themselves when a volley of shots fired in the air by the constable and his newly made deputies frighten them away. The tramps run like mad. The constable and his deputies rush up to the meal, which looks so inviting they decide to let the tramps run and seating themselves at the edges of the cloth begin to devour the meal with great satisfaction.

HIS LITTLE SISTER (April 11).—Hans, an amiable Dutchman who keeps the Red Dog Delmonico, tells the boys that his little sister is coming from Germany and shows them the photograph of a beautiful young girl. She is the first woman to come to Red Dog Gulch, and the residents of the Arizona town prepare to welcome her in their glad rags. When she does come they find she does not come up to the photograph and after an indignation meeting demand an explanation of Hans. He shows the photograph and explains that he forgot to tell that the picture was made in 1883. Minna pursues all the men and they fight shy of the Delmonico, bringing Hans to the verge of bankruptcy. A horse thief is captured and they are about to lynch him when Pete suggests that they make him marry Minna. After he has seen her the thief begs them to lynch him, but they are hard-hearted and refuse. He is married to Minna and with tearful farewells they ship them out of camp.

OSTRICH AND PIGEON FARMS (April 13).—A beautiful live picture of an ostrich and pigeon farm in lower California. Herds of giant-birds are seen enjoying civilization, surrounded by palm trees and cheerful roosting houses. Strong iron fences are made for the visitors, who enjoy feeding the birds. One of the pretty pictures is that of a little boy riding one of the big birds, being held on by the keepers. Another is one of the keepers who rides an ostrich as fearlessly as he would a broncho. The birds trot off to lunch and return merrily to the field. The flocks of pigeons are also a pretty sight; thousands of the pretty birds rise in the air only to return to their quarters and enjoy the care of the model farm and careful attendants.

THE ALLIGATOR FARM (April 13).—The Alligator Farm is a very interesting picture; thousands of little reptiles, about six inches long, are climbing over one another in the improvised pond. Next we see them three or four feet long—they are wicked looking things, but the keepers handle them without fear. When handled, the alligator will try hard to give the keeper a bite, but the man is too quick, taking the top and under jaw between his hands he quickly closed the wicked looking mouth and then he will in sport pull the reptile's tail as it tries to scamper into the pool. One big fellow is probably eight feet long. The keeper gives him a jolt, but the crocodile is sleepy and in a few seconds is again innocent of all that is going on in the farm.

BECKY GETS A HUSBAND (April 13).—Abe Cohen with his wife and daughter run a cheap dry goods shop on Jerico Street. Tim Casey, a hod-carrier, and his wife and son Pat live next door. A board fence separates the two back yards and Pat Casey and Becky Cohen enjoy much good flirtation. Abe Cohen has little use for the Irish and is especially down on Pat, who often comes into the store, throws kisses at Becky and tickles her under the chin. One evening Abe catches the sweethearts at their fun and he promptly orders Becky back into the house and drives Pat out of the store. The mothers of the boy and girl both agree that it would not be a bad match and try very hard to get the fathers to see it in the same light, but Abe is obdurate and won't listen to it. The sweethearts and their mothers work hard on the old man and finally win out. Becky and Pat are duly engaged and in short order married. As might be expected, the two nationalities do not mix well, many unfortunate arguments take place at the wedding feast and finally a severe quarrel takes place between Abe and Tim over the color of the Creme de Minthe. The white offends the Irishman and the Green raises the ire of the Hebrew. The fight commenced by the two fathers is gradually picked up by the balance of the two factions. An Irish cop and Jewish policeman come in to quell the battle royal, but are quickly overpowered. They ring for the fire department and the firemen disperse the whole party with a deluge of the fire hose.

BIOGRAPH.

THE FEMALE OF THE SPECIES (April 15).—Drear indeed is the aspect of the little mining camp, deserted by all but four survivors of the terrors of this desert land. The graves in the background vividly tell a story of privation and suffering. The little party comprises a miner, his wife and her sister, and a young woman, who is the sole survivor of another family nearby. Death is inevitable should they stay longer, and so the four start their race with death to the desert's rim. At their first resting place, the wife and her sister go in search of water to replenish their supply. Left alone with the girl, the husband, in a vagary of weakness, makes advances to her. This is seen by the wife from a distance, and in the struggle which ensues, the man, who is a physical wreck, pays the penalty with his life. As the wife and sister stand over the lonely grave, they, wrongly suspecting the girl, are seized with a desire for vengeance, the perpetration of which is only averted by a singular intervention of fate.

JUST LIKE A WOMAN (April 18).—A fortune-hunter is the accepted suitor of the daughter of an apparently wealthy widow, but when she receives notice that the oil stocks, in which her late husband's fortune is invested, are worthless, he finds the young girl less attractive. The broker who has represented the widow calls to explain the situation and extend his sympathy. Accompanying him is a wealthy friend, who becomes quite interested in the girl, although he is twice her age. He, later, makes a formal proposal of marriage, believing that he can win her love through kindness. The girl for the sake of her mother accepts and they are married. Despite his great love for the girl he is unable to overcome the great difference in their ages, and enjoining the broker

SELIG.

THE OTHER WOMAN (April 15).—Dorothy Kent secretly loves her employer, William Smythe, a photographer. Smythe and his pretty assistant have, for some years, been attempting to perfect a process of color photography. Smythe grows discouraged and is about to abandon the work when Dorothy suddenly achieves the desired goal. Smythe embraces Dorothy, much to that young lady's pleasure. Smythe's wife has observed the embrace. Believing that she has interrupted a laison between Miss Kent and her husband, she takes her child and leaves. The husband rushes home. He finds that his wife has left him for good. Upon returning to the office he finds that Dorothy has patented and sold the color process secret, and is now wealthy. The years pass, Smythe, once strong and prosperous is now the penniless, dissipated plaything of the vampire woman Dorothy. Fate has also dealt harshly with Mrs. Smythe and we now find her reduced to the position of scullery maid. By coincidence she is employed by Dorothy. Smythe calls upon Dorothy for the last time. He shows her a revolver. He asks for a last kiss. She gives him a sneer. He turns to go and comes face to face with his wife. Slowly, a mutual understanding comes to the long estranged pair, and as they leave the room, happy once more in the possession of each other, the other woman slowly, cynically picks up the revolver and—the picture ends, leaving behind it a moral.

THE END OF THE ROMANCE (April 16).—Alice Gray is discontented with her quiet life in her Southern village home. She allows herself to become engaged to John Strong, a reliable but quiet young man.

Alice goes to visit an aunt in a coast city. She meets Lieutenant Dupree, of the French Navy. He flirts with her, and she, thinking this the great romance of which she has dreamed, falls violently in love with him. She writes to John a curt dismissal.

In his grief, John finds sympathy and comfort in Kitty Lee. Before a great while, they are married, and enter upon a life of calm happiness. To her bewilderment, Dupree has sailed away without asking Alice to be his wife. As time passes and she hears no word from him, Alice grows desperate, and goes to Jacksonville, where his ship is lying. To her humiliation and grief she finds that, like other sailors, Dupree has a sweetheart in every port, and even witnesses his marriage to another.

Not knowing that John is married, Alice determines to return to him. The scene of simple happiness which she finds, the peaceful home such as might have been her own, only serves to impress upon her more bitterly the extent of her folly. At her home she finds upon her dressing table a photograph of Dupree. The burning of the picture is the end of her shattered romance.

THE DEVIL, THE SERVANT AND THE MAN (April 18).—This strong allegorical drama is founded upon The Devil, and The Servant in the House. The man neglects his home and wife and spends his time at the club and is here induced to attend a matinee of the "Devil," in company with two other men.

Later, two chorus girls join the party and they all proceed to a nearby palm garden to enjoy the music and the liquid trimmings. While here the man receives a note from Edna, his favorite amorita, requesting that he attend, with her, that evening a performance of "The Servant in the House." He excuses himself from the party and departs for home to dress for the evening.

His wife remonstrates with him for leaving her alone, but he assures her he is only going to the club and pays little heed to her warning note which she leaves for him on the table. The note reads, "If you persist in drinking and going out at night do not blame your wife if she does likewise."

He joins Edna and they witness "The Servant in the House." It is late when he returns home and sinking into an easy chair is soon in dream land. While in this subconscious state the Devil appears and tells him that his wife is playing false with him. The man is nigh crazed, and quickly follows the Devil, who shows him his wife first in the arms of another man, and later at the French ball in the arms of still another. The Devil places a revolver into the man's hand and in his rage the man kills the woman he had called wife. He then rushes home.

Believing himself now awake, but remembering his dream, he now hastens to his wife's room, only to find it empty. He remembers her note, and, filled with remorse, is about to place the revolver to his own temple, when "The Servant in the House" appears and leads him to a screen behind which his wife is sleeping quietly. He now really awakens and, as he prostrates himself before her praying for forgiveness, he thanks the God he serves for revealing in a dream the folly of his evil ways.

BESSIE'S DREAM (April 19).—Bessie and Jack are sweethearts, but they quarrel because Bessie wants to go fishing and Jack doesn't. She goes away pouting and proceeds alone to the brookside with her fishing tackle. He goes home in a huff. Later, Jack realizes he has acted badly towards Bessie and he is sorry. He secures a fishing outfit and goes in search of her to effect a reconciliation. Meanwhile, Bessie has but poor success. She grows weary of the sport, and finally goes to sleep with her fishing rod in her hand, and has a strange dream.

She suddenly finds herself at Catalina Island with Jack. They listen to some thrilling experiences of old man Brown as he tells of his landing some of the prize fish each season. They become enthused and desire to try their luck at capturing a big fish. They secure a boat and fishing paraphernalia and proceed to the best fishing grounds. She secures a tremendous strike, and not wishing to lose her prize, clings on to rod and is yanked overboard, while Jack loses his oars trying to help her, and is powerless to go to her assistance. She is towed rapidly through water by the unseen fish. She lands on the shores of a cannibal island, where, with the assistance of several of the natives, she succeeds in landing her prize, a huge jew fish. But her pleasure in the capture of this monstrous fish is spoiled by the knowledge of her having landed in this strange country where the cannibals apparently are man-eaters.

During the thrilling experiences of her dream, she unconsciously lands a small fish. She dreams on, and weeps, as she reflects while dreaming of her strange predicament.

At this juncture, Jack rushes on scene prepared to join her in her sport, and finding her in tears, runs to her side and awakens her. Bessie is very happy then, in the realization that it is after all only a dream.

A TRIP TO TAHITI IN THE SOUTH PACIFIC (April 19).—Picturing in an interesting manner glimpses of the life, customs and industries of this tropical island.

EDISON.

THE INSURGENT SENATOR (April 16).—A young senator finds himself opposed to the methods of the boss and his particular henchmen in the matter of a certain bill which is being put through in the interest of a group of financiers. The boss tries the social bait, inviting him to his own home, introducing him to his daughter, wife and friends. He falls in love with the daughter, but even with this subtle influence, they are unable to win him to their way of thinking.

As a last resort they draft a supposititious letter charging the girl's father with treachery and graft in case the bill fails to pass. The boss takes care to leave this letter where his daughter will find it, and feeling that her father's honor is at stake, she at once goes to the young senator's office to plead with him not to make his speech against the bill. She uses her womanly arts to such effect that he several times waivers in his determination, but his honor is stronger even than his love. She finally seizes his manuscript and tears it up before him. Realizing then what her object has been, he takes her in his arms, kisses her roughly and dashes out of the room to arrive at the Senate Chamber just in time to make his speech from memory.

The girl is shocked and stunned for a moment and then begins to realize the kind of man she has been dealing with. When he returns he finds her still in his office, his manuscript partly put together again, and when the defeated boss comes to reckon with him and finds his daughter there he learns that she has chosen the better man of the two.

THE DUMB WOOING (April 17).—Phyllis Boggs is courted by two suitors, the stuttering Mr. Carter and Mr. Johnson, who has a very disturbing mannerism. Colonel Boggs, her father, is of the opinion that worthy men's affections are being trifled with and orders her to choose between them, emphatically forbidding her to entertain both. Between the stuttering of one and the funny mannerism of the other, Phyllis is not inclined to choose either. While Colonel Boggs is puzzling out some means of bringing matters to an issue, Phyllis, unbeknown to her father, becomes acquainted with a masterful fellow, Mr. Graham. They are attracted to each other immediately and a love affair results.

The colonel, under the impression that Phyllis is still in love with stuttering Carter or mannerism Johnson, summons them to his library and lays his plan before them in the hope that Phyllis will show her preference for one or the other. In order to win his daughter they must each in turn make their declaration of love to her without uttering a single word. In the drawing room adjoining the library Phyllis by chance overhears her father's plan and immediately telephones Mr. Graham, the hero of her dreams, that his proposal of marriage will now be accepted, providing he present himself at once and feign dumbness.

Returning to the drawing room she finds Carter, who falls on his knees before her, frantically gesticulating in an attempt to convey his love. She drags him behind the screen to wait for his answer. Seemingly the coast is clear for Johnson, who enters boldly and makes a most laughable pantomimic proposal for her hand, but he, too, is hustled behind the screen. The masterful Mr. Graham now arrives, takes Phyllis into his arms and without a word plants a resounding kiss upon her lips as a token of his sincere desire for her heart and hand. The loud kiss brings her father upon the scene who, after receiving due explanations in the sign language, approves of his daughter's choice, much to the discomfort and consternation of Carter and Johnson, who make a hasty and extremely laughable exit.

THE BOSS OF LUMBER CAMP NO. 4 (April 19).—James Warner is much chagrined at his son Willis' accumulation of bad habits and disinclination to work. He puts him to work as timekeeper in one of his winter logging camps. Bob Foster, a college man, takes a kindly interest in Willis and tries in vain to keep him out of mischief.

Willis' sister, Florence, thinking to cheer him up in his exile, decides to visit him in camp. Here she meets Bob Foster and a mutual attachment is soon evident. Left to his own devices Willis continues his drinking and gambling. One day being a partcular heavy loser, he resorts to cheating and is caught. The men are furious and bent on giving him a coat of tar and feathers, but Bob manages to get him out of their clutches and hold them at bay while Willis makes his escape. Willis rushes to his cabin where he tells Florence of his danger. There is little time for action, for the men, having thrust Bob aside, are making their way to the cabin, bent on revenge. Bob, however, manages to arrive ahead of them and taking his stand in front of the cabin holds them off. Inside the cabin, Florence hides Willis in the loft and slipping into men's clothes makes her escape through the back window. Her plan of leading the men from Willis' hiding place is successful, for as soon as they catch sight of her, they give chase thinking she is Willis.

Bob enters the cabin and learning from Willis that it is really Florence the men are chasing starts out to head her off. Florence has made her way to the hill road where by the aid of skees she is rapidly leaving the men behind when she is confronted by Bob, who catches her. The men, coming up, realize that they have been outwitted and that Willis is beyond reach and make the best of the situation. Florence and Bob soon come to the conclusion that they love each other and with her father's sanction there is no obstacle to their ultimate happiness.

DREAM DANCES (April 20).—These dances are performed by Virginia Myers, a baby girl of five years. Every mother and every child not to mention the fathers in the audience will love this little artiste with her beautiful supple baby figure and winsome smile.

The dances are separated into different groups with appropriate scenic backgrounds and the whole picture will prove a delight to the eye and a pleasant memory to every spectator.

HOW PATRICK'S EYES WERE OPENED (April 20).—Patrick Connolly, a wealthy contractor, sees a charming beauty on the street who attracts him. Pat has a friend who is a "card sharp" and in a place of refreshment they happen to meet and Pat catches him cheating. Pat's dislike for his friend is very apparent and while he is walking on the street with his new found sweetheart, Mike presents himself and forces an introduction, much to Pat's disgust.

Then a salesman comes into Pat's office offering for sale a "projecto-optican," an instrument that can be attached to the 'phone and enable you to see the person with whom you are conversing. Pat shows that he has not much faith in it, but when the salesman asks if he has a lady love he beams with delight and confesses. The salesman attaches the instrument for demonstration. Pat calls up his sweetheart and the demonstration proves successful, for there Pat discovers his rival. In deep regret he buys the invention that he may watch further developments. However, it is to his ultimate advantage, as he finds out that his fair one is false in more ways than one, and by a "card sharp" trick of Mike's, Pat finds an easy way to bow gracefully out.

TRUE TILL DEATH (April 25).—In the days just before the Civil War, Elizabeth Blake has two handsome suitors, Philip and Paul, equally worthy. She accepts the latter and their life is extremely happy. They grace many a dance hall. When war breaks out, Philip and Paul are called to arms, and Paul is for the first time parted from his young wife and baby. Elizabeth gives him a locket to carry during the trying days. Philip, her old-time suitor, brings home the sad news of the brave Lieutenant Paul's death, and it breaks her heart.

Twenty-five years later, Philip again proposes, only to be refused for the second time, for Elizabeth's steadfastness and memory of the man who had made a few years of her life so replete with sweet joy—her husband never wavered. Meanwhile her child had died and left a grandchild for her safe keeping. This was the only joy now in Elizabeth's life, and even this was about to be taken from her, for he was in love and wanted to marry.

Remembering her own happy days as a bride, Elizabeth brings out the clothes worn by her and Paul at their first ball, and to awaken old memories, begs the young couple to don them for a coming mask ball. The transfiguration is com-

One, Three, Six and Eight Sheets 5c, 25c, 50c plete, and Elizabeth is carried back to those happy days of long ago. She falls asleep and dreams that the painting of Paul, for years ornamenting the stairway, becomes animated, and once more leads her gracefully over the dance hall. And in that dream comes sleep; peaceful eternal sleep—death. His alone had she been, and "true till death."

PATHE.

PATHE'S WEEKLY No. 15, 1912 (April 8).—St. Mortiz, Switzerland. The winter season closes with a series of horse races on a snow track.

Rome, Italy. The Chinese Minister and his family, under the new Chinese flag, drink a toast to the Chinese Republic.

Logansport, Ind. The ice jam on the Wabash River suddenly breaks, flooding the town and leaving miniature icebergs in all the streets.

Paris, France. President Falliès opens the Agricultural Exposition.

Gem, Kan. Winter lingers after spring has officially arrived. A Rock Island passenger train is stalled for 3 days in snowdrifts twenty miles away from this, the nearest town. The rotary plow at last digs them out in time to prevent starvation.

Benghazi, Tripoli. Three hundred Arabian Camelleers, prisoners of war, are escorted to the coast.

Fond du lac, Wis. Governor Woodrow Wilson, of New Jersey, candidate for the Democratic nomination for President of the United States, makes many new friends and adherents during his visit to this city.

Melbourne, Australia. Lord Denham, Governor General of Australia, presents flags to the regiments which took part in the Boer War.

Washington, D. C. The remains of 38 men of the crew of the U. S. S. Maine are buried in Arlington National Cemetery with full military orders.

PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 16 (April 15).—Norfolk, Va. The schooner Joseph G. Ray, sunk off Cape Charles and a menace to navigation, is destroyed by the U. S. Revenue Cutter Onondaga.

Dayton, Ohio. The Ohio Exhibitors' League meets and decides how the world should be operated.

Chalons-sur-Marne, France. Corporal Deschamps is condemned to twenty years' hard labor for selling a military secret to a foreign power and suffers the infamy of military degradation before the entire garrison.

Hillsville, Va. The court house has been in the lime light ever since the Allen gang shot up the court as sentence was pronounced on Floyd Allen. Here we see the exterior and interior of the court house and eight members of the jury. Dexter Goad, county clerk; Christopher Columbus Cain, the juror shot twice; Captain Belk of the detective force, with another member of the posse. The jail. The home of Sidna Allen, leader of the gang, for whose caputre, dead or alive, a reward of $1,000 is offered. Sidna Edwards, for whose capture $1,000 was offered.

Newark, N. J. A novel method is used to wreck the chimney of an abandoned factory. The stack measured 186 feet high and 28 feet in diameter.

Paris, France. The spring styles present many novelties in millinery and hair-dressing.

Havana, Cuba. Amid the roar of saluting cannon and the rattle of musketry, with every ship's flag dipped, with every sailor's head uncovered, to the plaintive strains of "Nearer My God to Thee" occurs the most impressive naval ceremony of modern times—the burial of the U. S. S. Maine.

EASY MARKS (April 17).—On a bet a friend attempts to rob another friend's house. The latter discovers the burglary, then he recognizes his friend and allows the burglar to relieve him and his guests of all their valuables. Later they discover the would-be burglar has been replaced by a real one. The situation, it is readily seen, is of great comedy possibilities, and the best use has been made of it.

TRAINING FIGHTING COCKS IN CUBA (April 17).—This shows a series of very interesting views of how the game cocks are trained and trimmed for the furious battles that they take part in.

THE FISHERMAID'S LOVE STORY (April 18).—A story of love and jealousy which involves the little fishing village of Gloucester. An exceedingly fascinating story, with a sweet romance running its entire length. The story is written around a pretty girl who has three lovers. There is keen rivalry, a fascinating mystery and an unexpected climax.

C. G. P. C.

THE ANONYMOUS LETTER (April 16).—A married woman is fascinated by a young man and makes an appointment with him. Her sister discovers the plot and persuades her sister to renounce her new friend. To do this the married woman calls on him; is followed by her sister, the sister sees this, manages to get to the rendezvous first and save all parties. This film is exceedingly dramatic from the opening scene to the final action on the screen. Napierkowska, the Russian dancer, and Henri Krauss both play in the film.

THE ALBERTOS (April 16).—A very clever vaudeville stunt which will please the most exacting.

A HASTY HONEYMOON (April 19).—A sailor lad, having just married his sweetheart, is called to sea with his boat. The bride, afraid of being left alone, disguises herself in a sailor's suit and ships as cabin boy. Later she is discovered by the captain, whose idea is to send her ashore, but after witnessing the great love between the bride and her husband, his better nature asserts itself and he permits her to stay.

AN EXCURSION IN NEW ZEALAND (April 19).—This travelogue carries the spectator through the glories of the semi-radical verdure of New Zealand. In some cases, up the mountain side above the clouds, and in through the very placid bosoms of the emerald lakes.

THE ART OF PRINTING (April 20).—A comprehensive and interesting film showing the processes used in the most modern printery in the world—the Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C.

BATHING CAVALRY HORSES (April 20).—This film is sure to express an interest to everyone in your audience. It shows cavalry horses of the French Army being driven into the stream. Many horses object to the process and the consequences are highly entertaining.

ECLAIR.

A LIVING MEMORY (March 26).—A sweet, simple story of one man's love for a woman who married another and left him only a lingering memory of her. It tells how, years after, she sent her child to him after a long struggle with adversity until she died. It shows a gloomy home of wealth made brighter by the subtle charms of girlhood. Even the old spark of love is kindled by this image of another. Finally, John Ransome tries to shut out this sweet influence. Age has taken hold of him and the youth and love are for the young. But the girl knew better than he and the story's conclusion is just as it should be.

BROOMS AND DUSTPANS (March 28).—Whenever the spoiled son of a generous father grows to an age when he feels the world could not exist without him, the events which follow result in one of two things: He goes to the dogs altogether or something happens to set him right and turn him around in the right direction. Hence "Brooms and Dustpans," while a comedy, teaches a moral in its telling, as all Eclair films do. It shows how a clever girl can shame a silly youth and love him all the while, at the same time bringing father to realize that hope remains even for the seemingly hopeless youngster in his "wild oats" sowing period of life.

A GYPSY'S HEART (April 14).—Giglio and Violetta live more on love than on money. A woman peddler arrives at the village market, offering for sale jewelry trinkets and baubles. Violetta would like to buy a beautiful silk shawl; alas! they have no money, and the woman peddler goes on carrying the coveted treasure. Nina, a gypsy girl, has seen all these proceedings, and she is touched by the sorrow of the young lovers. Giglio has gone away. Nina overtakes him and offers her assistance to help him so that they both could earn the necessary amount to buy the shawl. Giglio accepts and the young couple appear before the Café terrace. Nina dances and Giglio plays the violin. The receipts are sufficient to buy the shawl. With a brotherly kiss Giglio thanks the dancer for her help. Unfortunately Violetta surprises them. She thinks she is being deceived, and losing all hope she runs toward a steep incline, where death will relieve her sufferings. Giglio and Nina follow her and arrive just in time to prevent her from carrying out her plans, and while Giglio is explaining her mistake, Nina covers her gently with the shawl she longed for so much. Then, leaving the two lovers in each other's arms, the gypsy girl, like a fairy of goodness, goes quickly and discretely away.

NESTOR.

THE TORN LETTER (April 8).—John Arnold is a fugitive from justice, charged with a crime of which he is innocent. One night he pays a visit to his home town and sends a note to his sister to meet him at an appointed place. In her excitement, Mabel tears the note in two, one-half of which falls to the floor as she hides the portions in her dress. Throwing a shawl over her head, she hurries from the house to meet her brother. Scott, Mabel's husband, is of a very jealous nature. Returning home in the absence of his wife, he finds the part of the note which Mabel had dropped, reads it, and believes his wife guilty of being untrue to him. On returning, Mabel is confronted by her husband, who demands that she tell him the name of her lover. In order to shield her brother, Mabel refuses to talk. Scott goes to his room, packs suit case and disappears.

The following morning Mabel finds letter from Scott, saying he has drowned himself. A searching party, on dragging the river for his body, come across Scott's hat and coat (which he had purposely placed there) and all believe him dead.

Two years later, Mabel, having to look around for a means of livelihood, becomes governess to the six-year-old child of Doctor Robert Ford, a widower. The child loves Mabel at once—the doctor later. He gains her consent to lead her to the altar. In the meantime, Scott and the fugitive brother have met in the mines in the Colorado mountains and neither knowing the history of the other, by an inscrutable decree of Fate, they become partners and close friends. Both remain in ignorance of each other's past life. Mabel, having learned at last of her brother's whereabouts, writes to tell him of her husband's (Scott's) jealousy and suicide, enclosing in the same letter the other half of the letter which had caused so much pain. Scott, upon seeing the handwriting and postmark upon the envelope, believes John to be the lover of his wife and he endeavors to get John's gun with which to shoot the supposed-to-be destroyer of his home. After a severe struggle, Scott is subdued and explanations follow. Scott compares the half of the letter he has always carried, since discovering what he thought his wife's perfidy, and finding the words and indentures complete, is broken in spirit, and in penitence starts for the East, a race with Time, to repair the ruin his jealousy has wrought. Heart failure, which he has contracted through his passion and brooding during the interim, prevents him making great speed, and he arrives upon the day of the wedding of Mabel to the doctor. He witnesses the ceremony through the window and attempts to ascend the steps leading to the house, but the shock has aggravated his complaint and he passes away upon the doorstep of the man who has just claimed Mabel for his wife.

THE RENEGADE (April 10).—Frank, an outlaw, has a sick wife, Mary. Frank threatens to strike his wife because she is not able to work for him. Dr. Gilbert, who pities his patient, tries to reason with her husband when the sheriff enters and arrests Frank. He is taken to prison and later attempts to escape. He is pursued by the guards. They follow him to the river bank where the outlaw, seeing escape in any other way impossible, dives into the water. His pursuers fire at him while he is in the water and as they do not see him reappear, believe they have killed him and notify his wife to that effect. However, he safely reaches the opposite shore and leaves the country.

The doctor has learned to love his unhappy patient and gains her consent to marry him. The happy couple, together with Mary's sister, who has always made her home with her, move to another home.

Frank, having heard of her marriage, comes to demand money of her. Waiting until the doctor has departed, he enters the house and confronts his wife, demanding a wallet of money that she is putting in a drawer. Her sister, in the meanwhile, slips out unobserved by Frank and goes for help. Just as the renegade husband has forcibly taken the money from his wife, the doctor returns for his medicine-case, which he had forgotten while bidding adieu to his wife. He is surprised to find his wife's bedroom door locked and to discover the strange hat on the table. He commands his wife to open the door. Frank, in the meantime, covers her with his gun as he starts for the window. The doctor, from the other side of the door, draws his gun and again commands Mary to open the door. By this time, Frank has forced Mary to stand between himself and the door. As he jumps out of the window, he fires, barely missing the doctor, who returns the fire. Fortunately, Mary, who has gotten to the door to open it, faints just before the doctor fires. She revives and explains the situation to the doctor, who hastens out to follow Frank. Just then, the sheriff and his men, whom the sister had notified, appear. They begin the pursuit of Frank and after wounding him severely, capture him and return to the doctor's house. Dr. Gilbert, together with Dr. Wilson, extract the bullet which wounded him and all is done for him that medical skill could accomplish. All in vain, however, as he dies and leaves Mary free to once more enter upon a happily married life with the doctor.

IN DRY TERRITORY (April 13).—Mrs. Brown, Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Jones are appointed a committee by the Women's Temperance League to get signatures to a petition against the re establishing of saloons in their dry town. Their husbands refuse to sign it and raise an awful row.

The next day, the ladies of the committee meet in parlor "A" of the leading hotel in the town, where they can consult without interruption. Their husbands also meet at the same time to play a quiet little game and engage parlor "B" of the same hotel. The ladies order tea. The men order wine, but because it is a dry town, the wine is served in a teapot. The two bell-boys carrying the trays meet in the hall and seeing the coast clear, lay the trays down and indulge in a game of crap. Hearing someone coming, they pick up the wrong trays and take them to the rooms.

The women, thinking it is a new brand of tea, learn to like the wine and by the time the Temperance candidate arrives, they feel mighty fine and insist on singing. The husbands, who have become disgusted on finding their wine just plain tea, hear the singing and looking through the keyhole, are astonished to see their loving wives all making up to the Temperance man.

The ladies leave the hotel for a spin in the waiting automobile, with its gaily flying banners "The Women's Temperance League." They shake hands with the colored porter and drive away. While the porter is getting over his astonishment the husbands, who have entered the room lately occupied by their wives, discover that their wives have been imbibing something stronger than tea. They resolve, one and all, to sign the petition and swear off drinking themselves.

SAVED BY A CAT (April 17).—Mr. Lewis, a wealthy merchant, is betrayed by one of his clerks, a member of a gang of hold-up men. The merchant is held up on his way to close a big business deal. He has with him considerable cash. When he almost reaches his destination, the gang attacks him, dope him, and take him to a tunnel, where, after they relieve him of his money, he is left until he comes to himself.

When Mr. Lewis gets back to his office he calls in the services of Detective Harper, who after a thorough investigation, finds a clue which leads him to suspect the clerk. After close watching, he shadows the clerk to the den of the criminals. The clerk, however, is on his guard and knowing that he is under surveillance, encourages the detective to enter the den of the criminals. Here, Harper is trapped. He eventually finds himself in a room closed in by automatic doors. The only outlet is a small grated window near the ceiling of the room. On the sill of this window, the detective finds a cat. Anticipating trouble, Harper scribbles a note and ties it to the collar of the cat. Soon the cat leaves and the window automatically closes airtight. After a space, Harper begins struggling, desperately trying to fight off asphyxiation. Presently he is overcome by the fumes of the gases with which the gang had filled his room.

In the meanwhile the cat strays back to her home. Her old maid mistress sees the note around her neck and brings the police to the rescue of the detective, who is found almost dead.

BILLY, THE DETECTIVE (April 19).—Billy is anxious to be a detective. He buys a book "How to Become a Detective," and studies the theories of detecting crime most assiduously. So when he finds the diary belonging to Dora Burns and sees an entry that she, Dora, is going to buy a revolver for defending herself against burglars, and a hatchet for killing Edward, Billy sees an opportunity of putting into operation the methods he had learned. He shadows Dora to her home. Dora Burns discovers him, however, and forcibly convinces him that he should skidoo.

Billy is persistent. He will not be thwarted. His head is swelled with the awful crime Dora is about to commit and so he runs to get the police. The police arrive and ask Dora for an explanation—for they find blood spots on her apron and on her brother's coat. Dora takes the police to the kitchen and show the police a bleeding rooster. Billy's career as a detective ends then and there.

BABY'S ADVENTURES (April 15).—Mr. and Mrs. Smith live in Harlem. Their six months' old baby boy is a joy to their lives. One morning the fond mother after rocking him to sleep orders the maid to put him in his crib for his morning nap. The maid hears the call of a baker's boy, with whom she is in love. She places the baby in a half filled clothes basket and runs out to meet her sweetheart. A gust of wind from the open window blows the table cloth over the basket hiding the sleeping child.

The colored woman who does the washing for them, calls in the meantime for the week's wash. Bedelia, the cook, seeing the partially filled basket, places the balance of the clothes on top of the sleeping child. The washer-woman takes the basket and departs. The maid returns, misses the basket and informs the parents, and then begins a chase for the recovery of baby. The baker's wagon is brought into service. The washer-woman takes a street car. The distracted father and the maid reach the ferry just too late to catch it. The washer-woman lives in Jersey so the chase continues.

After a series of adventures the father arrives just in time to prevent the washer-woman from dumping the contents of the basket into a huge pot of boiling water. Happy in the possession of his child the proud father starts back to Harlem and his distracted wife. While plodding wearily back to the street car he meets an acquaintance who offers him the use of his baby's buggy. On their way they pass near the Palisades. Curiosity leads them to the edge and while they stand admiring the beautiful sight, a strong wind sets the buggy agoing, and before the party turn around it is too late. The carriage with the baby has descended a sheer drop of two hundred feet. Again the baby is lucky. A friendly tree breaks the fall, leaving the baby uninjured. A long rope is secured. A man volunteers to descend and he is lowered down over the cliff to the final rescue of this adventurous baby.

A GAY DECEIVER (April 17).—Percival Smith kisses his wife affectionately good-bye and makes his departure. On the outside of his home he flirts with two fair dames and follows in their wake. He catches up with them at the park, and neglecting to proceed to his office he enters a café. He starts to flirt with a waitress and his newly made lady friends take umbrage and depart in high dungeon. He continues to pet his fair Priscilla until the manager takes him bodily and flings him into the street.

He picks himself up, adjusts his anatomy and betakes himself to pastures new. A pretty chorus girl is leaving the stage door of a theater. The gay deceiver approaches her in a mincing manner. She rebuffs him, he persists, she flaunts away, he follows fast. Around the corner they go and she tells a cop, and into this copper's brawny embrace comes rushing the gay Lothario. But the deceiver sprints away and thus escapes.

Next a janitor of buxom form comes under his observation, but when he assays to touch her, she meets him with a bucket of water. The next day at his office we find him feeding chocolates to his stenographer, whispering to her softly and printing luscious kisses on her lips. Suddenly his faithful spouse appears. In a rage she rushes home and engages her house-maid's services. An hour later, her startled husband learns over the phone that his home has been invaded by one of his own species. He rushes home and discovers a personage seated in his wife's lap. He summons a policeman and then he courageously smashes the high hat from the head of the affinity. The hat flies off and from BERMUDA (April 17).—A fleeting glimpse of some of its wondrous beauty and rare charm, caught by the camera, that may be justly designated, "most remarkable." Its scenic investiture is of surpassing loveliness and divinely gorgeous in atmosphere. Even the depths of the ocean are made to give up its wonders and we have brought up to our vision the finny hosts of this region in a remarkable exhibition of deep sea photography.

GAUMONT.

A BET AND ITS RESULTS (April 18).—Count and Countess d'Artois recently married. The pair is ardently in love and shower a deluge of kisses upon each other. Despite this fact, two dandies from London attempt to win the heart of the charming Countess. In order to gain their end, which, by the way, was wagered on by a bet, the two, unbeknown to each other, bribe the master of ceremonies to become waiters. Their ardent admiration results in spilling dishes down fancy gowns and over dazzling dress shirt fronts, which finally incites the indignation of all assembled with the result that the two waiter-dandies are roughly eliminated. Ever-hopeful, they seek the room of the Countess and await in the hall for her answer to their proposal. To their deep chagrin she hands out a pair of pumps assuring them that empty as they are they contain just as much love for them as does her heart. The dandies start to take out their spites on each other with the result that the remaining hotel guests join in the melee and soon disfigure the insipid countenances of the two ardent Englishmen.

DRIVEN FROM THE RANCH (April 21).—Cowboy Joe is certainly a bad tempered proposition and mighty hard to subdue when on the rampage. This particular afternoon, Joe had lost heavily at gambling and took his adverse luck out on several of his comrades. They came to blows, with the result that Joe received a discharge from his employer, who was also the sheriff of that locality. In vain did the cowboy seek other employment, but the meanness of his disposition rendered same impossible. Discouraged and disheartened, Joe is forced to spend the night on the plains with his faithful horse as his only friend. Early in the morning it so happens that the sheriff and his posse pass him in search of a notorious horse-thief. Inasmuch as they did not see him, Joe took advantage of their absence and in revenge for his dismissal stampeded the sheriff's horses. However, the daughter of the sheriff detects the sound of hoofs, learns the nature of the trouble and gallops to her father with the news. The leader and his posse then start in pursuit of Joe and are just in the act of overtaking him when he leaps from his horse onto a passing train and escapes. His daring climbing and maneuvering aboard the freight cars forms the most exciting and original picture ever produced. Baffled by his miraculous escape, a price of $200 is placed upon his head and each of the cowboys, together with the sheriff himself, vow to find the culprit dead or alive. They track to a desolate marsh when they separate to hunt him down. It falls to the lot of the sheriff to come upon him and rather than see him hang, he offers him his pistol so that he may commit suicide.

THANHOUSER.

THE BABY BRIDE (April 16).—He was the only son of a pretty young widow. Perhaps she spoiled him, but anyway she loved him dearly, for although he was under seven years old, he had many cute quaint ways, and heartily returned the affection of his mamma. Their next-door neighbor was a man the boy did not approve of. He was not married, for one thing, there were no little children in his house to play with. Besides, when he met mamma, he never had time to talk to her son. Really he was in love with the pretty young widow, but was too bashful to say so.

Then, one day, a new interest came into the boy's life. A beautiful maiden, she was three years old, moved into the house next door. She was the niece of the man, and had been left to him when brother died. The man, however, did not know much about children, and left the girl in the care of a cross old housekeeper, who did not appreciate her. It made the boy's blood boil, for he failed to understand why anyone could be anything but sweet to her. One of his few sorrows was that he did not have a little sister to play with, guide and protect, and he soon knew that the little girl next door was the very one he would have chosen had the stork deigned to consult him.

Matters finally came to a climax. He saw the wicked housekeeper brutally and fiendishly scold the wonderful creature, and he decided that something must be done, so he firmly took her away, silencing the housekeeper's objections with missiles, led the baby to his home, and told his mother that now he had a little sister.

His grief was profound when the child was taken away from him, and he could not understand why this was done, even when his mother explained to him that they had "no legal right" to the child. He did not comprehend what legal rights were, but later he learned, when he glanced at a newspaper and saw that the "legal rights" of a father were secondary to the legal rights of a husband.

Naturally there was only one thing to do—elope—and he did it. The baby did not object, she liked the boy, and anything he said was law in her eyes. So she obediently took her bonnet, trotted to a window, permitted him to help her out stealthily and hand in hand they wandered along to a convenient parsonage.

The minister listened to their troubles, he was a kindly man, then bade them wait until he could secure the necessary witnesses. Instead he telephoned the mother and she and the baby's uncle hastened to the parsonage.

The boy explained that he was marrying the baby, to provide against her being neglected and ill-treated, and declared that he would defend his "legal rights." The uncle, really a good sort, but like most unmarried men, helpless when it came to a matter of caring for children saw a way out of the difficulty. He told the boy that he could have the guardianship of the baby if—and then he looked at the pretty widow inquiringly. She blushed and hesitated then—well there was a wedding that afternoon after all, and the baby was never neglected again.

INTO THE DESERT (April 19).—An American girl and her father were traveling in the Orient, and there they were joined by the young woman's fiance. He knew the dangers of the country of old, but the girl laughed at his warnings and believed that the life and property were as safe as it is on Broadway, New York. The girl hired a dragoman, and took an excursion into the desert, despite her sweetheart's most emphatic warning.

It does not pay to disregard the advice of the well informed, as the girl soon found to her cost, for the treacherous guide led her into the midst of a band of Arabs. The chief of the clan had seen the girl roaming about the bazars, and had ordered the dragoman to lure her to his camp. After she had been made a prisoner, the chief sent a demand for a heavy ransom to her father.

The father was willing to pay, but the fiance, declaring the elder man was too feeble to make the journey, won his consent to be messenger to the desert. The Arab chief met him at the appointed place, but treacherously refused to return the girl after receiving the money. A fight followed, and the white man was left for dead on the desert sands.

Where love failed, jealousy won. The Arab's favorite wife had been detailed as guard over the American girl, and believed that her sway was disputed. Therefore she willingly listened to the girl's plea for freedom, guided her from the camp, and gave her a horse.

On her way across the desert, the girl met her American sweetheart, wounded, but still determined not to return without her. The two rode away together, were pursued, and the American had the grim satisfaction of evening scores with the Arab who had dared to cast his eyes on a woman who was far superior to him.

POWERS

HER LORD AND MASTER (?) (April 16).—Jenkins, a henpecked husband, visits a moving picture theater and in a film witnesses the successful termination of a plan by means of which another henpecked husband reduces his wife to submission. Jenkins goes home and proceeds to put the same plan into operation with his wife, but unfortunately Mrs. Jenkins fails to submit to the treatment like the wife in the picture did, and after a strenuous seance, poor Jenkins finds himself once more reduced to a pulp.

WHAT'S THE USE? (April 16).—Percy, Harold and Charlie are all desperately in love with pretty Helen and their constant thought and one object in life is to win her fair hand in spite of the efforts of the other two.

Percy seems to be the favorite until Harold's superior attractions places him first in her affections. He is in turn superseded by Charlie, who appears an easy winner, until fate itself plays him a scurvy trick and he, too, "loses out" and joins his fellow rivals in bemoaning their unhapply lot.

ETHEL'S SACRIFICE (April 20).—Chester Long and Philip Marsden are close friends in college, until Philip graduates, he being in a higher class. A year later, Chester is forced to resign his college career in order to support his widowed mother. He, however, is unable to find employment until he meets Philip, who knowing his ability in running a car, recommends him for the position of a chauffeur with the family of his fiancée, Rose Warren. Now, Rose, has a sister Ethel, who admires Chester the moment she sees him and he falls desperately in love with her.

The four young folks naturally see a great deal of each other, with the result that Philip and Rose have a big wedding and on the same night Ethel and Chester elope. Mr. Warren, Ethel father, disowns her and forbids anyone mentioning her name. The relations between the young couples, however, remain unbroken and if anything, the trouble binds the sisters closer together.

Two years later both couples have children born to them. Ethel and her baby are well and strong, but Rose's baby dies at birth and Rose herself lies at the point of death, calling for her dead baby. The doctor tells Philip that unless a substitute baby is procured, Rose will die.

Then it is that Ethel, learning of her sister's condition, offers her baby as a substitute. After the child has been taken to Rose, Ethel passes the house daily in order to obtain a view of the little one through the window. One day as she reaches the house, she sees crepe on the door—Rose is dead. The consequent sorrow softens the heart of Ethel's father and when he learns the identity of the baby, whose presence prolonged the life of Rose, he once more takes Ethel to his arms and welcomes her husband to his home.

RESCUED BY WIRELESS (April 15).—When Grace Langdon undertook her trip of mingled adventure and pleasure to Mexico, she was unaware of the dangers that break out sporadically in that disturbed land. She and her party, however, had not been amongst the dons long before there was trouble between the Mexicans and the few Americans there. The situation was complicated by the fact that the chief of the Mexican revolutionaries fell in love with Grace. The United States consul was a friend of the girl and sought to obtain outside assistance by telegraph. In this he was frustrated by the revolutionary leader, who shot him in the leg as he was operating the telegraph wires.

The result was that Grace and her friends were captured by the revolutionaries and taken aboard a Mexican gunboat. But Grace had not neglected her fiance in San Francisco; she had wired to him. So down came the gallant fellow with all speed and as luck would have it his yacht arrived in the disturbed waters just when the plight of Grace and her friends was at its darkest. By the aid of wireless telegraphy, her fiance was enabled to communicate with the U. S. S. Ohio and make known the dangers in which the party of American citizens were placed by the threatening Mexicans.

The Ohio's men thereupon got busy and after putting the Mexican rebels to rout, released the prisoners and incidentally hastened the happy marriage of Grace Langdon and her lover.

WOMAN ALWAYS PAYS (April 18).—This story affords the renowned European actress, Asta Nielsen, an opportunity of displaying her wonderful ability as a great artist. It depicts the life of a young woman, who tiring of her husband and her life in attractive surroundings conceives a sudden admiration for a picturesque circus man. He also is attracted by her, and when he appears and demands that she cast in her lot with the circus folks, she yields and leaves her beautiful home for the wandering life of a circus.

Under the tuition of her admirer, she becomes a gifted member of the "haute ecole." The new life fascinates her. Months pass, she becomes disillusioned, for her hero, Rudolph, proves fickle; he transfers his affections to another girl of the circus. There is a quarrel between the two women and Asta and Rudolph are discharged.

Down they sink in the social scale; he becomes a dissolute ne'er do well, and she the pianist at a popular beer garden. Her husband during these months has never ceased to care for Asta and in a chance meeting persuades her to return to home and duty. She consents and while in the act of leaving, Rudolph appears and, exerting the old power over her, she remains with him.

Still the husband is undaunted, and makes yet another effort to regain his wife, but Rudolph refuses to give her up. This time, the man and woman quarrel; and in the struggle which follows, Asta stabs him to death. She is arrested and taken away to prison, whilst her helpless husband looks on.

LONESOME MISS WIGGS (April 20).—Krautzmeyer is a respectable German widower, who finds himself temporarily but seriously embarrassed. Just before leaving his office for the day, he receives word from a firm of attorneys that unless a sum of $5,000—long overdue—is paid within forty-eight hours, they will attach his property. In despair the little German wends his way homeward where he is greeted by his mother-in-law and his two children.

While looking over an evening paper he comes across an advertisement wherein a young lady advertises for a husband, stating that the lucky man is to receive a gift of $5,000 from her on the day of the wedding. Krantzmeyer sees his chance and decides to make up as a French Count. The lady sends him her photograph and he is in ecstacy over her beauty.

While on his way to meet his wife-to-be, he is waylaid by three tramps, who discover his plans and one is appointed to impersonate Krautzmeyer. The tramp now disguesed as a French Count starts out to woo the lady, but arriving at her residence is horror stricken at sight of the homely woman who is awaiting her fiance. He beats a hasty retreat, and allows Krautzmeyer to carry out his original plans, without telling him of his discovery.

Krautzmeyer's mother-in-law, meanwhile, suspects the cause of his absence and finds the newspaper clipping which tells of his plan. She follows him and arrives just as Krautzmeyer meets Miss Wiggs. He, too, is appalled by her appearance and tries to retreat, but is stopped by the tramps, who are on the scene. Miss Wiggs has given the German the $5,000 which the tramps stole, and when the mother-in-law demands that he leave with her, Miss Wiggs demands her money. How Krautzmeyer gets out of this predicament is convincingly revealed at the finale of the picture.

Assured by J-M Transite Asbestos Wood Booths

The danger of panic and the imperilling of property and lives, caused by moving picture machine films catching fire, cannot be overestimated. There is but one way of safeguarding the film while running through the machine and that is to use an absolutely fireproof booth.

J-M Transite Asbestos Wood Booths are not only thoroughly fireproof, but sound-proof. Furthermore, being non-conductors of electricity, they cannot become charged or grounded like metal booths. The semi-portable type is made of Asbestos wood panels framed with angle iron—a strong, substantial and permanent construction. Easily put together and taken apart. Panels are interchangeable and booth can be enlarged at will.

J-M Booths are far superior to ordinary wood, metal and all other kinds.

ing the best preserved natural park in the world. In Yellowstone Park is seen the rare spectacle of the geysers in active operation. The animal kingdom is well represented by bears and other specimens of feræ natura. The scenery is very diversified, including all sorts of vegetation and natural formations.

The picture is to be divided into four releases sent out at intervals of a few weeks. One picture will deal with the wonderful waterfalls of the park; another picture will show the well known geysers and hot springs in actual operation; the third picture will deal with the bears, cormorants and other members of the brute creation in the great park; the fourth picture will be devoted to the scenic grandeurs of the park.

AMERICAN.

THE COWARD (April 11).—Jack Walton feared physical punishment and could never be induced to indulge in fisticuffs. His companions branded him as a coward. But endurance comes to an end and one day, when tormented to the breaking point by a Mexican, Jack's anger flared forth and drawing his gun (of which he was not afraid) he fired, killing the Mexican instantly.

Then the very men who had driven him to it, formed the posse that was to hunt him down. They hurried to the mountains where Jack had sought refuge. High up in the mountains, the hunted man eluded them, until the pangs of hunger drove him to seek some human habitation. Approaching the sheriff's home, he sees food in preparation. He enters and holding the frightened woman at the point of his gun, compels her to set before him the repast she had prepared for her husband.

In the next room, her baby, ill and in high fever, is sleepingly fitfully. Even his unaccustomed eyes tells him that the child is dangerously ill. He volunteers to go for the doctor and hurries from the house. Around the corner of one of the outbuildings, one of the posse is waiting. As Jack dashes around the corner, the man fires, wounding him severely. Jack stumbles on and soon reaches the doctor. He urges the doctor to hurry to the bedside of the sick child and then hurries to the mountain fastnesses. The doctor by hard work soon has the child resting quietly.

When the sheriff returns from his fruitless search, he learns that his child was saved by the arrival of a stranger. Asking his wife to describe the man, she tells him that the stranger left a note for him. He opens and reads: "If you still think I'm a coward, come up to Sage Ridge and see." But the sheriff never found it convenient to follow the coward further.

THE DISTANT RELATIVE (April 15).—Marguerite and Pearl Alcott were sisters and orphans. Bob White and Charley Wells were friends and fellow-cowpunchers and, incidentally, Bob loved Marguerite and Charley had long cast amorous glances at the dainty figure of Pearl. A day came when Marguerite and Pearl, orphans, were visited by The Distant Relative, a person of much self-importance and assumed authority. She at once began a re-organization of the girl's household, maintaining self-appointed protectorate over the two girls much to the disgust of Bob and Charley. Finally the Distant Relative conceived an idea.

The result of this idea was a letter to an unscrupulous but good-looking young man who arrived shortly after and announced himself as a long lost cousin. Marguerite didn't like his looks, but Pearl soon fell victim to his city wiles, to the utter unhappiness of Charley. The bogus cousin caused corruption among the ranch-hands. They threatened a strike and it was only heroic work of Bob and Charley that prevented a general walk-out. But if he did damage to the ranch by distilling trouble among its workers, he threatened twice as much by proposing to the foolish Pearl that they run away and be married. The cousin felt himself quite confident and he and the distant relative soon laid their plans for the poor girl's undoing, hoping by the marriage to gain control of the ranch. The Distant Relative and the bogus cousin discussed it thoroughly, and the bogus cousin promised to divide the estate with his confederate.

But what happens often to confederates happened to them. Bob White, chancing to step around the veranda, overheard. He kept the matter to himself for a few days when he was suddenly electrified to discover Pearl and the bogus cousin getting into the ranch buggy with suitcase and other externals of a journey. He promptly raised the ranch with his cries, horses were mounted and the chase began. It seemed impossible to overtake them. Down hills they came in precipitous haste, but the buggy and its occupants kept steadily in advance of them. Suddenly an idea came to Bob. He stopped a passing automobile, climbed in with Marguerite and Charley and the chase was again resumed. At the outskirts of the town they overtook the flying pair. Charley received Pearl into his arms and the bogus cousin, along with the Distant Relative, were booted out of town.

REPUBLIC.

LOS ANARQUISTAS (April 16).—Gaspard has been reduced to poverty by excessive drinking. He has a friend who is in reality the leader of a band of anarchists who are plotting to overthrow the present government of a South American republic. The chief of the Secret Service chances to meet Gaspard's wife and assists her home after she had a bad fall. The friend, Renaud, arouses in Gaspard a ferocious hatred when he informs him that Gaspard's wife is in love with the government official.

Renaud persuades Gaspard to join his band of anarchists. In the meantime, the chief of the Secret Service receives word that a plot against the President has been formed. Gaspard joins the league. Renaud learns that the President is going to leave the Executive Mansion and informs his fellow conspirators.

The detective who has been following Renaud gains admittance to their rendezvous and secretly removes the explosive from the satchel which they intend to hurl at the President. The conspirators do not notice the absence of the explosive from the satchel which is taken to Gaspard, who meets Renaud at the spot where the President is supposed to pass.

In the meantime, the wife finds the note that Gaspard dropped. She decides to prevent the assassination. She comes upon the scene just as Gaspard throws what he thinks is a deadly explosive in front of the President and escort. Gaspard in terror as he realizes that the President is unharmed, runs madly away. He is pursued by the Secret Service men.

Gaspard in his endeavor to escape falls over a cliff and is dangerously injured. Realizing that death is near he confesses all and Renaud and his fellow conspirators are captured. The chief expresses his sympathy for Gaspard's wife, later his strong interest ripens into love which she returns.

A SEVERE LESSON (April 20).—Bob Morgan, a young New Yorker, is in love with Reta Dar, a society girl. Later she realizes that Bob has not enough of the world's wherewith to provide her with surroundings her nature demands, and writes him a letter breaking off the engagement. Bob leaves the city and later joins the army and his company is stationed at Flagstaff, Arizona. Five years later, the former lovers have lost track of each other. Col. Mosley, a widower with a grown-up daughter, is in command of the post where Bob is stationed. The colonel has taken a trip East and in the course of events takes unto himself a wife and after a short honeymoon returns. The couple arrive at the post a few days later; Miss Mosley does not take kindly to her step-mother.

A grand ball and reception is given in honor of the colonel and his daughter. The officers and ladies are giving a royal welcome to his wife when Bob Morgan, a young cavalry officer, enters the room. As his eyes fall on the colonel's wife, he beholds Reta, his former sweetheart. She almost faints on sight of him. The keen eyes of the colonel's daughter have, unobserved by others, noted the actions of Morgan and her step-mother and resolves to keep her eyes open. Morgan gets a chance to write on Reta's dancing card a request that she meet him alone. As the assemblage leave the room to form for the next dance, Reta drops her program, which the colonel's daughter hastily picks up. She dare not tell her father, so she confides in Lieutenant Bagley, her lover, who takes the situation in hand; Morgan, in the meantime, has persecuted Reta with his attentions. The truth dawns on Bagley that the supposed love affair is all one-sided and proceeds to dispose of him, which he does in a highly interesting manner. A happy ending is brought about by the reconciliation of step-mother and daughter and the marriage of Lieutenant Bagley to Miss Mosley.

MAJESTIC.

THE RETURN OF LIFE (April 14).—Henry Boardman has no interest in life except his law business, to which he has devoted himself so tirelessly that he has undermined his health. The realization of this comes when he faints in his office. Staggering toward his door, he draws his handkerchief from his pocket, and presses it against his face, at the same time dropping his pocket-book.

The purse is found by Tessa, a little Italian apple girl. She takes it home, resolved to send it by mail. This course meets with the approval of her parents, but not with that of Pedro, her unscrupulous lover. Tessa finds money and papers in the pocket-book and mails these. Pedro protests in vain against this incomprehensible honesty.

The next morning Boardman receives his money and papers, and resolves to visit their finder. He finds Tessa and her parents in their poor tenement home. Boardman returns home, removes his beard, assumes the garb of a working man, and returning to the tenement, rents a room from the girl's parents, they and Tessa not recognizing him. Tessa's beauty and goodness make a deep impression on him.

Tessa's father is injured and it becomes necessary for someone to undertake the support of the family. Pedro promptly repudiates this task, and Boardman steps into the breach and goes forth as a laboring man. He is seen at his work, and afterwards at dinner with the family. The admiration between himself and Tessa deepens into love and her alert mind expands under his kindly tuition. This is viewed with the deepest resentment by Pedro.

Returning from work, one day, Boardman meets his family physician, who is astounded at the change in him. He leads the doctor to his little tenement room, and tells him of the life he has been leading. The worthy doctor examines Boardman, assures him that the following of his prescription has met with success and that he can now go back to his own world, sound in body and limb.

When Boardman tells Tessa that the time for parting has come, her love for him cannot be concealed. He is overjoyed at this confirmation of his hopes, and the little Italian girl goes with him to his home as his wife to enjoy what will be a new life for her.

NOT ON THE PROGRAM (April 16).—Richard Thornley prefers Stewart Blake as a suitor for his daughter, Madge, because he is wealthy, and Madge prefers Philip Allen. When Blake asks Thornley for the girl's hand, he naturally receives a favorable answer, the father not knowing of Phil's attentions to Madge. Gilbert Thornley, the girl's brother, is attracted by Blake's mode of life, and plays poker with him, and his wealthy friends, the result being heavy losses for the boy. He applies to his father for money, which is reluctantly supplied to him. More losses and another request meets with an absolute refusal from the old gentleman and, overcome by temptation, Gilbert takes a considerable sum from his father's cash box.

Phil chooses this inauspicious time to ask Thornley's consent to a marriage with his daughter. He not only is refused, but, being found alone in the library immediately before the theft is discovered is suspected by the father of having taken the money. Thornley confides these suspicions to his son and to Blake, the latter at once realizes that Gilbert is the guilty one, but he is pleased to have suspicion fall on his favored rival. The boy, Gilbert, finds himself in a very delicate situation.

The Thornleys and their friends are indulging in amateur theatricals, and good-natured Phil undertakes to portray a burglar. In this capacity, Phil is to shoot a householder, played by the girl's father. Phil hurries to the stage, leaving his revolver in the dressing-room. Blake finds the weapon. He removes the blanks with which the revolver is loaded, substituting ball cartridges.

The stage-manager is giving final instructions, and the curtain is about to rise, and Phil to make his entrance as the burglar, when he discovers that he has forgotten his pistol. The elder Thornley agrees to get it, runs to the dressing-room, and as he picks up the weapon, discovers that it is loaded to kill. He is about to rush out and denounce Phil, when a better method occurs to him. He takes out the ball cartridges and puts back the blanks.

The play proceeds, the time for the shooting comes, and Thornley falls, feigning to be mortally wounded. Blake at once dashes out on the stage, and accuses Phil of having planned the old gentleman's murder. The supposed victim rises, faces Blake, and demands to know how he was aware that the revolver was loaded, drawing the ball cartridges from his pocket, and displaying them to the bewildered man, whose guilt is only too apparent. Gilbert's conscience awakens, and he confesses to his father that he was the guilty one, and is granted forgiveness. Thornley withdraws his objections to the union of Madge and Phil.

REX.

A TANGLED WEB (April 11).—It was only a little flirtation, a little break in the gray monotony of her steady, settled life. She loved her dusband, but she was a wee bit tired of the white lilies and the innocent violets, and her woman's heart hungered for the blood-red rose just a little way beyond the narrow path. So she plucked the sweet, tragic blossom, and she gave it her lips, and found it was a weed. Man is a destructive animal, and he was just a man; so he did not pursue the blossoms torn and crushed and cast by his kind on the highway, but sought the buds just opening into light and life. It was only a little flirtation—you must never forget that. For the smile and the guile of him, she coquetted with disaster; for the lie that lies in a traitor's eyes she bartered a little of her soul. He was suave and she was simple.

She wrote him a note, "Meet me on the beach to-night." That night the woman sat in her room, and a thought visited her mind, the thought that she had done a wrong. A bright, lone star glimmered in the skies above, gleamed and glittered like the eye of God, seeking her soul and searching its secret. It warmed and warned her—and she was saved.

We have said "he was just a man," but we will amend the statement, because he was not entirely. So he wrote her, telling her that money alone would be the price of his silence, and that unless a certain amount were paid him at once he would disclose the secret. She loved her husband, you recall; and she wanted her husband's love. So she gave the money. And again the demand was made, and again it was met. And yet again he asked, and she had none to give. So she sent a companion her necklace, asking her to pawn it and give the vulture the proceeds.

Her husband's fortune was suddenly swept away, and to save himself he asked for her jewels. In self-defense she told him they had been stolen, and the detectives he employed traced them to the other woman. The wife was really a good woman, so to save the friend from paying the penalty for a crime she did not commit, she confessed all. And the rest of the story was told in their kiss!

THE SEAL OF TIME (April 14).—With the frozen desert all about them, under the chill Northern skies, a vast stretch of sombre gray, they plighted their troth. He had left the wilderness of mortar and steel with its lights and sights and tears and sneers to come to this land of night, with its cold and gold, to cut through the white for the yellow beneath. And the girl, brave in her hope that his would be realized, had come with him.

His goal was gold; and he took the trail. For days he searched it, and found only despair. Then —broke his leg. An old Indian found him, alone and suffering, and took him to his hut. For days he nursed the injured limb, and for weeks the wanderer loitered in the camp of the Indian. Never a word reached the girl. Then she received a letter from home, advising her that she had inherited a large fortune, and that she must return at once to complete the legal requirements for acquiring it.

She left; left also a note at the little inn telling her absent lover where and why she had gone. But fate caused the inn-keeper to transfer his property to another; so that when the man returned after the weary months he was told she had left, but had left no word, nor message. He wooed forgetfulness. He did the menial labor about the saloon for another drop of the miserable, happy poison, and once, while the proprietor was not looking, he tried to steal a bottle. But he was detected, and in the fury of the other's rage he hurled an old tea-pot at him; the object crashed to the ground, and a slip of paper rolled out, the paper that contained the knowledge and the truth.

He borrowed the money to return to the city. She had sent for him and searched for him, and destiny had made her think he had forgotten, so she promised another. He came to the house, peeped in through the window, saw her and another. Slowly he turned, slowly he walked away, to face the morrow's years and tears.

MAKE 'EM YOURSELF SLIDES

Make them yourself. Written with pen and ink or typewriter. Three minutes to make a slide. Used for advertising slides, to announce future or feature programmes, for chorus slides when chorus slide is missing. We send four colors of gelatin. The slides look well and any one can make them. They are handy also for announcing vaudeville acts. In fact they may be readily used for anything you may wish to say to your audience.

For the sum of three dollars ($3) cash with order, we will send by express, charges not prepaid, or $3.50 by registered mail, prepaid, the following:

24 cover glass, 1 package binder strips, 1 dozen mats, 1 instruction sheet, 1 form sheet and 50 strips assorted colors gelatin—enough for from 300 to 400 slides. Order now. Address

Capt. Scott's South Pole Expedition

IN TWO REELS

Great Scott! Just heard from. 150 miles from the coveted pole. Do you realize what this means for you, Mr. State-Right Buyer? Every daily paper crowding its columns with Scott news Absolute copyright protection. Nation-wide advertising. Lithos in 1, 2, 3 and 8-sheet sizes.

THE EDGE OF THE GREAT ICE BARRIER

A complete two-reel reproduction of the Antarctic Expedition of Captain Robert Scott, R.N., from the hour of his departure from his beginning point at Wellington, New Zealand, up to his winter encampment at Cape Evans across the great ice-barrier of the South Frigid Zone, including such genuine and unusual pictures as dodging through icebergs, crunching the heavily clogging ice-floes, making the landing on the great Ice Barrier itself, unloading the Terra Nova, building the Antarctic camp, sleighing, ski-ing, hunting, rounding up and sporting with the penguins, the lonely peaks of Mount Erebus, and the gloomy menacing Mount Terror and, lastly, the climaxing feature of unusual grandeur and rarity, "THE MIDNIGHT SUN."

ONE VIEW OF THE MIDNIGHT SUN

The Timeliest Sensation Ever Sprung!

A Real Two-Reel Feature of Antarctic Reality

REMEMBER—Our attorneys are Goldie & Gumm, 27 William Street, New York. They stand prepared to relentlessly prosecute the first infringer. They will go to any extreme to land their man. So will we.

Release for Saturday, April 13th

Joke on Henpeck

This picture recounts the adventures of two hard-up individuals, who, being denied credit by an inn-keeper, resort to a novel way of raising "the price"

On the same reel: Glimpses of Southern France

A beautiful scenic subject

Release for Saturday, April 20th

Those Eyes

A strong dramatic story enacted with an intensity which gives to every scene a semblance of reality. One of the most powerful stories which could be chosen for a moving picture drama

SAVOY THEATRE
Broadway and 34th Street, New York City

AGAIN THE

scores on Broadway. Its march, Mr. Exhibitor, is irresistible. You might just as well line up with the crowd to-day as wait for the future. Read what this Broadway exhibitor says:

New York City, March 26, 1912.

Inventors Specialty Mfg. Co.,
401 Ashland Blk.,
Chicago, Ill.

Gentlemen:

I am greatly pleased with the Perfection Concave Screen you recently installed in my theater. The distortions of the characters as shown upon my former screen, because of the high "throw" in my theater, always had been a source of annoyance to me. This trouble your curtain has corrected. Your screen also has enabled me to fill the side seats and boxes in my theater with satisfied patrons, who formerly shunned those seats because of the blurred appearance of the pictures. The elimination of the eye-strain and the fact that your curtain remains in perfect focus and is not subject to bulging and shaking by movements on the stage are other features which impressed me. It is only a matter of time when every up-to-date exhibitor must have your curtain.

Yours truly,

Jerome Rosenberg

We can satisfy you as well as the above purchaser. Write for information.

SCENARIO WRITERS!

If your scenarios do not sell find out why. Perhaps your manuscript can be rewritten and made saleable, and your mistakes may be corrected in future manuscripts. The author of "Technique of the Photoplay," etc., will give your manuscript personal criticism and revision for a fee of only $2.

REVISION—Scenarios having a reasonable chance of a sale will be edited and revised and a typewritten copy supplied for one dollar per finished page. Send the manuscript and a reading fee of one dollar. If the scenario will not warrant further expense, it will be returned to you; if it does, you will be advised as to full cost. Please note that this covers no criticism.

Exhibitors!

Submit your difficulties to the author of "The Photoplay Theater," and other articles on management, for advice and suggestion, the result of twenty years' experience in amusement enterprises. Simple questions $1 each.

SEARCHING FOR THE GHOST

THE GHOST OF SULPHUR MOUNTAIN

Bob, a young Easterner, injured upon his arrival in the West, is befriended by Joe, a miner, and taken to the latter's home to recuperate. Joe's wife, Mary, is sympathetic and Joe, realizing Bob's attractiveness, mistakes his wife's tenderness for love for the Easterner, and decides to put himself out of their way. He causes an explosion that makes it appear that he has been killed, then hermits himself. Mary is heartbroken. Six months later miners see him and flee fearing him a ghost. A search party, headed by the Easterner, finds him and persuades him to return home, where he finds, besides a true wife, the greatest of all surprises awaiting him.

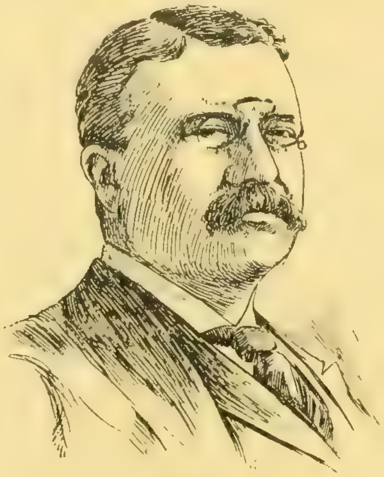
Tues., April 30 "CRY OF THE CHILDREN" IN TWO REELS

Tues., April 30 "CRY OF THE CHILDREN" IN TWO REELS



THE CRY OF THE CHILDREN

AS HEARD BY THEODORE ROOSEVELT

When I plead the cause of the overworked girl in a factory, of the stunted child toiling at inhuman labor, of all who work excessively long hours, or in unhealthy surroundings, of the family dwelling in the squalor of a noisome tenement; when I protest against the unfair profit of unscrupulous and conscienceless men or against the greedy exploitation of the helpless by the beneficiary of privilege, I am not only fighting for the weak, I am fighting also for the strong.

REJUVENATION

is another Make-You-THINK story. We are adding to the world's knowledge with these. They induce people to profit by their fellows' example. They show the mistakes of humans, and thereby prevent other humans from making them. This reel shows the mistake of living a purposeless existence. It gives a cure, too.

RELEASED FRIDAY, APRIL 26
Heart Interest Special

When Mandy Came to Town

is the old, old story of the man who leaves his family for a woman of the stage, with a new, new ending. But then we ALWAYS treat matters in a NEW way. Thanhouser stories are celebrated for their ORIGINALITY. The very nature of this story just jams it with human interest—we like to know if HE goes back to his family.

The MAJESTIC IS KING OF COMEDY!

Thousands of Exhibitors throughout the country are writing us that they like Majestic comedies better than any other pictures now being produced. This is the pulse of the entire country and the Exchange not buying Majestic pictures to-day is losing its best opportunity to secure new customers and keep the old ones.

DO NOT MISS THESE COMEDIES!

Sunday, April 21st, "Down and Out." The Moving Picture World says, "It is a picture of actor life in a great city, funny to look at but tragic to the characters, the details are worked out with much thought and the whole plot is decidedly logical. If any comedy can be called a feature then this comedy is a feature."

Tuesday, April 23rd, "The Installment Plan." A roaring comedy—a young couple furnishes a house on the installment plan and fails to meet a payment; all furniture is removed and they make furniture of their own; a wealthy friend comes, pays them a visit and the predicaments arising from home-made furniture will cause laughs from start to finish.

Sunday, April 28th, "Boys." An excellent comedy—Mrs. Brown, a widow, has a son John. Dr. Andrews, a widower, also has a son John. The old folks marry and the boys do not agree—see what they do to each other and the old folks.

Tuesday, April 30th, "The Silent Call." One of the strongest dramatic pictures ever produced—the silent call of the telephone switch-board in a gorgeous hotel plays the most important part and averts worlds of trouble.

MAJESTICS AT 9 CENTS A FOOT!

Exchange Men, do not fail to send in your order at once—get the best pictures in the market at 9 cents a foot. By placing a standing order for two Majestics each week, you pay only nine cents—the price for one a week is 10 cents—excellent 4 color posters, 5 cents each.

April 9th, "A Warrior Bold"—Farce Comedy
" 14th, "The Return of Life"—Comedy Drama
" 16th, "Not On the Program"—Comedy Drama

No wide awake exhibitor will be satisfied unless he gets TWO MAJESTICS EACH WEEK. If your Exchange will not give them to you, let us know.

PERFECTION

WHEN WE SECURED THE EXCLUSIVE NORTH AMERICAN RIGHTS TO the "ASTA NIELSEN FEATURES" we did not dream of the tremendous Sensation these Photo-Plays would produce in America's Moving Picture World.

We did not dream that other Film Manufacturers would fight tooth and nail for the privilege of using short subjects featuring Miss Nielsen.

We never even hoped that prominent Film Manufacturers of America would publicly sing the praises of Miss Nielsen, testifying in their song that Miss Nielsen is the GREATEST MOVING PICTURE ACTRESS IN THE WORLD TODAY—BARRING NONE.

BUT ALL OF THIS HAS COME TO PASS.

WE DID KNOW, however, that we were getting the Greatest FEATURE FILMS the world has ever seen.

AND WE DO KNOW that the Purchasers of State Rights for these features are busy-busy-busy supplying the enormous demand for bookings for our first release "GIPSY BLOOD" and are, therefore, reaping a Golden Harvest from their investment.

AND WE DO KNOW that if YOU want a share of this BIG BUSINESS you must decide immediately on the States you want or you will be too late.

The Lover's Signal

Raymond Dawson and Frances Livingston are in consequence of paternal objection forced to carry on a clandestine courtship, and at the signal of the whistle Frances hastens to the trysting place. Two girls, chums of Frances, for a joke, send an anonymous letter stating that Raymond is a married man. On reading the letter the little girl swoons, and on recovery she has lost her memory. The doctor, being unable to help her, suggests that the lover be sent for. He gives the whistle and it restores his sweetheart's reason.

Released Thursday, April 18th, 1912
Length about 1000 feet

A Gay Time in Jacksonville, Fla.

Two Germans arrive at Jacksonville, Fla., and resolve to see the town. They visit the Alligator and Ostrich farms, then endeavor to scrape acquaintance with two gorgeous girls, who unfortunately for Fritz and Hans have gentlemen friends, who resent the freedom. They then shamble into the Morocco Temple and are promptly kicked out. The firemen turn the hose on them, and finally the police escort them to the depot, and advise them to take the next train.

Released Saturday, April 20th, 1912
Length about 1000 feet

Captain King's Rescue

Capt. King, in command of a column of cavalry at Douglas, Arizona, becomes acquainted with the family of a ranchman and falls in love with Pearl, the eighteen-year-old daughter. He has, however, a rival, a suave Mexican, named Pedro. One day the captain sees the Mexican ill-treating a poor Indian; he rescues the Indian and Pedro is driven from the ranch. The Mexican in revenge seeks the life of the captain, but the Indian gets aid from the camp and the would-be murderer is secured.

Released Monday, April 22nd, 1912
Length about 1000 feet

A New Beginning

Calvert and Mildred Cole love each other, but they live the wrong way. Calvert goes to his club and Mildred to society functions. They each find occasion to visit sick families and there find the love and tenderness that they treat too lightly. These visits awaken the fast dying passion in their hearts and with a fond embrace there is a New Beginning.

VITAGRAPH

"THE PIPE" MONDAY, APRIL 15th

If you hit this you are bound to secure the assistance of a good thing. It's a big consolation and a great boon. This shows how a man didn't leave home, because his wife let him smoke at his own fireside.

"THE CAVE MAN" TUESDAY, APRIL 16th

None more wonderful than the Cave Man, who lived over five thousand years ago. He dressed in the skins of animals and dwelt in rocky caverns. The sentiments and feelings, the manners and customs of the people of the stone age are clearly shown in this feature film.

"WORKING FOR HUBBY" WEDNESDAY, APRIL 17th

It's lots of fun—there are two hubbies and two wives, a lot whole of stenographers, who are put to flight by a lot of mice let loose in the big office building The wives win and land the jobs.

"THE CRAVEN" FRIDAY, APRIL 19th

Only goes to show that the wife is sometimes the "better man" of the two. A cowardly husband gets credit for bravery that his wife performs, leading others to believe that he is a man to be honored. It's a Western drama of excellence.

"WAY OF A MAN WITH A MAID"
SATURDAY, APRIL 20th

It's the right way. It's a lesson in love-making worth learning about. She gets "peevish and uppish." He withdraws his attentions. In tears she calls him back.

Facts and Comments

THE legislatures of all the larger States have now adjourned or have practically completed their labors and are about to adjourn. We have watched the course of hostile legislation in all these States and are now happy to state that in no case, as far as is now ascertainable, has any bill detrimental to the industry been enacted into a law. We would be greatly pleased and elated if we were able to tell our readers that this failure of proposed hostile legislation was due to the efforts of exhibitors and their associations, but such was not the case. In some of the Western States indeed the exhibitors' organizations were on the alert. They had shown their strength and intelligence upon former occasions and were therefore feared and respected by the legislators. On the whole, however, and especially in the East, the defeat of the oppressive bills must be explained on entirely different theories. This is the year for the nomination and election of a President and in every legislature the members of lower and upper houses were busy "playing politics," mending all kinds of political fences and making sure of their delegates to the national conventions. This activity left them small time to attend to the extermination of the motion pictures. We earnestly hope that this negative victory of the motion picture interests will not lull the exhibitors into any sense of fancied security. Next year the same reformers and "strikers," or reformers and "strikers" just like them, will be heard from and there will be plenty of time and opportunity for a vigorous prosecution of a legislative campaign against us. Forewarned is forearmed. We hope that exhibitors' organizations everywhere will bear these facts in mind and present a solid and powerful phalanx against the "cranks" and fanatics.

THEY do such things in "That beautiful Paris!" It seems that a large collection of highly seasoned and lowly immoral films had been seized by the police of the French capital and they were at a loss what to do with the contraband stuff. For some reason, not fully explained, they did not care to burn the films. The estimated length of this confiscated material was about one hundred thousand feet. Perhaps it would have made too big a bonfire. At any rate, the police decided to drown rather than burn the condemned pictures. Two detectives were sent to a little island in the river Seine, not inaptly called Vert Galant, and from its shores the films were cast into the waters. In the midst of their execution the detectives were themselves arrested on a charge of violating a city ordinance by dumping garbage into the Seine.

IN their panicky fear of the motion picture, various organizations of owners and managers of theaters in Europe have banded together to prevent actors and actresses of prominence from working before the moving picture camera. In this country where, let us hope, the individual liberty of the artist is far greater than in Europe, no such organized attempts to hamper the activity of cinematographic producers has been made so far. It is doubtful whether the attempt would result in more than a lot of free advertising for the motion picture. In Europe, however, the managerial edicts have far more force. Several very prominent artists had to abandon contracts made with producers of the silent stage. It is quite amusing to read the resolutions of the Amalgamated Directors of Theaters. While the resolutions condemn the connection of first-class artists with moving picture companies, they declare that "no objections will be urged against actors of ordinary ability or actors out of employment playing for the motion pictures." These worthy directors are about as keen-sighted as a lot of bats at high noon. In less than a couple of years all the prominent actors will try to get before the moving picture camera first and no directorial writ of prohibition will be worth its ink or paper.

WHY do not the censors get after the dreadful comic supplements to the Sunday editions of the yellow journals? Just think of the havoc the so-called "Katzenjammer Kids" have wrought in the household of a citizen of Iowa. Here is the awful story in all its harrowing details.

> One Sunday a few weeks ago, my wife heard an awful commotion in the kitchen and going out, found Elizabeth was running the cat's tail through the wringer as she had seen one of the kids in the Sunday papers doing. But last Sunday she pulled off the worst stunt and the one that caused me to put the quietus on the funny paper question. We had company in the front of the house, and as things were too quiet to seem natural in the kitchen where Elizabeth was playing, I went out to investigate. The girl had got the coal oil can and all around the room as high as she could reach, she had saturated the woodwork with kerosene. It lay in pools all over the floor and her dress was soaked in it. She was just climbing up on the chair to the match box and in another minute would have lit one and been blown into kingdom come. When I took her out into the woodshed for the private session she explained that she had been looking at the pictures of the "Katzenjammer" kids where they soaked the cabin of the ship in coal oil and then burned up the ship. She'll never get her eyes on another "Katzenjammer" kid if I can help it. Last Sunday I told her they were all drowned in the ocean and she cried for an hour over them.

This breaks the record of "juvenile depravity." No reformer, hereafter descanting on the horrible influence of the motion picture, can fail to mention the still more horrible influences of the comic supplements. The worst of it is, that most of us older folks like to look at the silly things ourselves, though for the sake of dignity we play the hyprocites and make sure the young ones are not around when we indulge.

Nip This in the Bud.

THE wildest, the most absurd and the most tyrannous form of censorship yet proposed in this land of the free has been embodied in a city ordinance introduced by Alderman Courtland Nicoll at a recent session of the distinguished body of statesmen, known as the New York Board of Aldermen. THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD prints in another column a full report of the action in the Board of Aldermen and likewise a complete text of the proposed ordinance.

This preposterous piece of proposed aldermanic legislation was not discussed, but was referred to the Committee on "Laws and Legislation." It is, to say the least, strange that the aldermen have up to the present time found no leisure to consider the so-called Mayor's ordinance dealing with the regulation of motion pictures. The Mayor's ordinance seems to be the result of some practical thinking at least and contains many provisions which, as we pointed out at the time, will probably meet with the approval of the great majority of the exhibitors in New York City. This ordinance has been before the public and officially before the Board of Aldermen for a good many weeks, if we remember rightly. If the subject was really of such burning interest to the aldermen some action in regard to it should have been taken by them long ago.

We do not believe for one moment that such an ordinance as the one introduced by Alderman Nicoll stands the slightest chance of ever becoming effective. It is framed in a spirit of arrogant contempt for the moving picture and the exhibitors and manufacturers of moving pictures. It breathes the autocratic and arbitrary spirit of Russia or Austria rather than England and America. It loftily ignores the splendid work done by the present Board of Censorship, which is fairly representative of public opinion and composed of men and women who are thoroughly fitted for their work. It flies in the face of the spirit if not of the letter of the ordinance of the Mayor and the fair-minded and impartial people behind that proposed ordinance. It seeks to degrade the moving picture and the exhibitor to the level of the perambulating purveyor of street music. It denies the first postulates of free government. In any part of the British dominions, not excepting Ireland and Canada, such an ordinance, as that fathered by this New York Alderman, would be killed right after its birth by an indignant press, voicing outraged public sentiment.

We have every reason to believe that Mr. James G. Wallace, the present chief of the Mayor's Bureau of Licenses, on whom under the proposed ordinance the power and duty of censorship would devolve, is a fair-minded and enlightened man and these strictures on the proposed ordinance are in no sense to be applied to him. The question rises above persons and involves principles of the utmost importance. We do not know who Mr. Wallace's successor will be, he may be as good a man as Mr. Wallace and he may be just a plain political henchman. We protest against the whole theory of this sort of censorship.

It is a pleasant thing to remember that Mayor Gaynor will have to be reckoned with by these aldermanic statesmen, even if a majority of them vote in favor of this ridiculous measure. Mayor Gaynor's pet aversion is just such a method of censorship. On the bench and in the Mayor's chair he has shown himself a true friend of the people. He has even in this city always emphasized the fact that we are living under a government of law and not of men. We feel very sure that he will veto this measure should it ever come to him for official approval, and his veto message will impart some valuable information to the Board of Aldermen.

In the meantime, it would seem a wise thing for the exhibitors' organization in this city to pay a little attention to this matter and watch its further progress. If there is to be a hearing on the proposed ordinance we hope the exhibitors will be heard from.

Let it be made plain that not only would such an ordinance be undemocratic, but that it would open a rich field for "graft." We will not say that it was conceived in a spirit of "graft" as well as tyranny, but we will say, that "graft" would follow it, just as thrift is said to follow fawning.

The Question of Posters.

THE work of the men who are turning out posters for the exhibitor is much underestimated. Whether this work is done through the lithographic process or is simply "home-made" it plays a big part in the industry. To begin with, a very large part of the public form their opinion of the motion picture by looking at the posters displayed in and about the moving picture theaters. It may be that lurid and riotous posters attract people. There is no doubt that in certain sections of every city the screaming poster does draw patronage. In such cases the exhibitor is not to blame if he resorts to the loudest posters imaginable. He must have patrons or he must close up. We are inclined to believe, however, that these cases are entirely exceptional and that, on the whole, the use of ultra-sensational posters does, and has done, great harm to the industry

If the displays in and about lobbies were based on system and a due regard to taste and decency, its effect upon the public would be much greater and far more wholesome than it is to-day in very many cases. The men who furnish the posters are of course largely guided by the wishes of their customers, the exhibitors, and the demand is still greatest for huge sheets and sensational announcements. There are of course occasions where an extraordinary attraction may be properly advertised in just about such a method, but the tendency to advertise everything and at all times in this circus style is to be deplored. It makes the public suspicious and incredulous and in the end hurts the drawing power of the really big attraction. In advertising as in printing there are different types and we must use them all. The value of big capital letters consists in the rarity with which they are used. If we use them all the time they lose their power to command attention.

In the lithographs that are furnished to exhibitors, the latter have no choice whatever. The result is much complaining, for which there is at times good ground. The selection of the scene to be used for the lithographic poster should be made with the utmost care. Too often the most sensational or even shocking scene is taken for the subject of the lithograph. Such a poster gives no true idea of the reel, which it is supposed to advertise. The poster is worthless, unless it accomplishes at least that much. The object of the title of an article is to give a general idea of the text of the article and the object of the poster must be to give a general and correct idea of the subject of the picture. Many exhibitors have complained to us that there is too much display of guns and masks and weapons of all kinds on the posters. This, unfortunately, is but too true. It ought not to be difficult to select the climax or one of the telling and most dramatic scenes. This surely can be done without a display of morbid sensationalism. In some instances it has looked to us as if the posters had been made up before the picture had gone through the fire of censorship. The censors eliminate the very things that the posters emphasize and the result is deception and misleading of the public.

The "hand-made" posters are generally the result of intelligent workmanship, but here a bad slip is even more offensive than a lithographic absurdity. The lettering of these hand-made posters should never be entrusted to any but competent hands. Bad spelling, bad English and foolish sentences can and should be avoided absolutely. Only yesterday while walking along Sixth Avenue we saw a tremendous banner with this "strange device": "Driving Home the Cows," "A Great Civil War Drama." This takes second prize to the old Ingomar poster "Ingomar," "A Grand Play of Old Ireland."

In Appreciation of J. P. Chalmers

By Louis Reeves Harrison

THE sudden death of the owner and editor of this publication has taken away from the moving picture world in general a striking figure of sterling honesty and sturdy independence, and has cast such a shadow of sorrow upon those of us who knew him well that it is yet difficult for us to realize that he is gone forever from our midst. His powerful frame was that of a man in superb health; his boyish face and spontaneous smile were those of a man with immortal youth in his soul; it is hard to think that we are not to see him again in this life, and harder still to bear the loss of so true a friend.

I could not attempt to count his friends—there was so little self-revelation in his quiet ways and modest speech that it took time to discover the big heart in his bosom—but there are probably many who never expressed their kindly feelings because he courted no sympathy or appreciation, though he gave both freely and in purest sincerity. His friends were perfectly well aware that he had a will of his own not to be daunted by ordinary obstacles—it enabled him to face all sorts of difficulties without flinching—but they also found that he so tempered his self-determining judgment that it was amenable to suggestion and could be modified by an opposed opinion drawn from logical premises.

At one time I feared that what proceeded from an unconstrained spirit of independence in the critical policy of the paper might be misconstrued—he was so opposed to releases that lowered or degraded the moving picture business that he was for openly denouncing them—and I offered in substitution an appreciation of all that was really fine as encouragement of good work. There were many delicate questions involved. It was absolutely necessary to the advertising value of a publication of this kind that indiscriminate praise should not be given to good, bad and indifferent photoplays, while, on the other hand, many well-meaning producers, whose releases were far below the average, were struggling towards superior presentation of their subjects. It was unwise to mislead those who placed dependence upon our critical opinion, yet unfair to dampen the enthusiasm of those trying to do their best.

While that problem may be still open for solution, he settled it as far as I was personally concerned by instructing me to say what I honestly believed with whatever helpful suggestions I could add. Once convinced that a writer was fair-minded and sincere of utterance, he accorded unqualified support, less concerned about the groundwork of critical judgment than its conformity to principles of right dealing. He especially desired all those associated with him to be actuated, as he was, by truth and justice. Here was a man of unfaltering courage in rendering to others what was their due.

No human being escapes from the inner conflict between self-interest, with its promise of smooth and pleasant paths, and that searching out of what is due others which constitutes the real happiness and value of life, but the course of this editor's intellectual and moral discipline, steadily and honestly pursued, had cleared his mental vision and enabled him to give ear to natural sympathies. With the failing and weak he was generous to a fault—he could not turn away from an appeal made by the veriest human dog kicked into a state of abject misery—he helped silently men who seemed to be beyond recall without pretense or hope of reward. He may not have given wisely from the point of view of those who affect being able to discriminate between the worthless and the deserving, but he afforded assistance generally that he might not miss one in sore need. His liberality in relieving the wants of others was charity in its highest and broadest manifestation.

In the course of conducting a business which affected so many and varied interests of importance, on one side producers using millions of capital and thousands of employees, on the other tens of thousands of exhibitors and their assistants and investments, this one man became the repository of many secrets which he guarded so jealously that they will probably die with him. He was the center of perpetual storms, yet he weathered them easily and held the respect of contending elements because all knew that he could be trusted. His discreet habit of mind followed him into his private life, so that he became as reserved concerning his own affairs as those of other people. On this account I am forced to say less of his career than of his character as I saw it. I can only judge from exterior evidence that he was a man who struggled manfully for all he had and gained splendidly in the experience.

So much for what J. P. Chalmers appeared to be, but there are some who could not help really knowing him, and I think we are united in realization that the whole world has lost a man of noble qualities and true value. A flood of memories will come to those of us who enter the little editorial sanctum where there was no formality of reception given those who were there to some purpose and no ill-natured complaint offered to those who were not. The editor might contest what was said and hold out stubbornly to make his point, but this was ordinarily done in a good-natured way, and his winning manner so well covered opposition that those defeated in their plans seldom went away grieved.

Outside of the office some few may have gleaned an impression that the editor's manner depended much upon how he felt at the moment of an interview, but they did not know him well or had not put his friendship to the test. When real necessity arose no one ever found him other than steadfast and loyal in purpose to all associated with him. Thus it happens that when we go into that tiny office of his, with its old littered desk and think of who sat there, the silent and self-willed man who governed with a light hand, who made the office one of the happiest of its kind, who stimulated and encouraged all about him, whose quiet generosities were of the noblest kind, we have tears in our hearts if not in our eyes.

Our sorrow may be selfish—each one of us has lost a true friend in a city where friends are few and far between—but that sorrow is sanctified by the unvoiced hopes and unuttered prayers that follow his soul on its journey.

RESOLUTIONS.

Dayton, Ohio, March 28, 1912.

RESOLVED, That we, The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, Ohio State Branch, in convention assembled this 28th day of March, 1912, do hereby extend our sympathy and deep regret to the family and friends of James P. Chalmers, editor of the Moving Picture World, of New York City, who, through an accident, met an untimely death while attending our State convention at the Auditorium of the National Cash Register Company, at Dayton, Ohio, on March 27th, 1912.

RESOLVED Further, That we greatly deplore the fact that this should have occurred as the result of our urgent invitation to Mr. Chalmers to be present at our convention; thereby causing great sorrow to not only his family and friends but to all members of this League as well.

RESOLVED, Further, That we recognized in Mr. Chalmers a strong friend and advocate of our cause, one who always gave a listening ear to our pleadings for the betterment of the moving picture industry, and who, through his journal, voiced our sentiments to the people.

RESOLVED, Further, That we extend a vote of thanks to the National Cash Register Company, of Dayton, Ohio, for the great care and attention bestowed upon Mr. Chalmers from the time of his accident until his death.

RESOLVED Further, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the family of Mr. Chalmers, to the journal of which he was the able editor, to the trade journals, to the National Cash Register Company, and that a copy be spread upon the minutes of this League.

Respectfully submitted,
THE MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA,
By C. M. Christenson, Secretary.

RESOLUTIONS BY DAYTON OPERATORS.

Dayton, Ohio, April 2nd, 1912.

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir:—At a meeting of the moving picture operators of the City of Dayton held here Sunday, March 31st, the following resolutions passed unanimously, and the recording secretary has been instructed to enter them in the minutes and to send a copy of them to the Moving Picture World.

WHEREAS, Almighty God, in His infinite wisdom, has removed from amongst us a sincere friend to union labor, we, the motion picture operators of the City of Dayton, wish to express with sincere regret the deep shock we all felt at the untimely end of a true champion, Mr. J. P. Chalmers.

RESOLVED, That we will endeavor, by holding his memory dear, to realize the high aims and ideals he held for the organization.

INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF ELECTRICAL WORKERS,
Jas. G. Strachan, Recording Secretary.

RESOLUTIONS BY CHICAGO LEAGUE.

The resolutions appearing below were adopted by the committee on resolutions of the Chicago Exhibitors' League, Local No. 2, and forwarded to the Chicago office of the World. The exhibitors of Chicago have always been friendly to the World, and have always entertained a high regard for its deceased owner and editor. The action of the league in drawing up these resolutions will be deeply appreciated by the relatives and friends of Mr. Chalmers:

WHEREAS: Almighty God, in His divine and infinite wisdom has called suddenly from our midst, our esteemed friend, James Petrie Chalmers; and

WHEREAS: Illinois Branch No. 2 is desirous of offering condolence to those who were bound to the deceased by the nearest and dearest ties, on the great loss they have sustained;

WHEREAS: James Petrie Chalmers was a splendid type of man in every sense, a devoted and affectionate son and brother, who took an earnest interest in the affairs of this branch and the league; therefore, be it

Resolved, that we, the members of the motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, Illinois Branch No. 2, in meeting assembled, extend to the family and friends of our deceased friend our sincere and heartfelt sympathy in their great bereavement, recognizing in this dispensation the hand of an All-Wise Providence, who doeth all things well; and

Resolved, that it is our prayer that He who holds the destinies of men and nations in His keep will afford them that consolation that He alone can give; and

Resolved, that those resolutions be forwarded to the family of our deceased friend, and a copy be spread on the records of this branch.

W. J. SWEENEY,
SIDNEY SMITH,
JULIUS A. ALCOCK,
Committee on Resolutions.

LETTERS OF TRIBUTE.

THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD.

I wish to express to you my regret in hearing of the sudden death of your Editor, J. P. Chalmers. While my relations with Mr. Chalmers have only been of a business nature, I realize that the moving picture industry has lost one of its best friends and advocates. With regards.—WILLARD HOWE, Correspondent, Washington, D. C.

MOVING PICTURE WORLD, New York, N. Y.

Upon picking up The World of the 6th inst., I noted with profound grief the death of my friend Mr. Chalmers. I was very much honored by his friendship and feel that all of us in the moving picture industry have lost one of our stanchest friends. It was my one ambition to have Mr. Chalmers see the performance at this theater because I know it would have brightened his life considerably. The motion picture exhibitors as well as everyone connected with this industry have lost a most valued friend and co-worker. Yours most sincerely.—S. L. ROTHAPFEL, Minneapolis, Minn.

MOVING PICTURE WORLD.

Please accept my sincere sympathy in this, your sad bereavement in the death of your most honorable chief. He was a man among men and, through his untiring efforts, he succeeded in placing the motion picture upon the high pedestal of popular fame that the art enjoys today. Every exhibitor throughout the United States has lost a friend, all honor to his name. I sincerely trust that his spirit is still among you and I believe you will earnestly strive to uphold the enviable reputation which he made for THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD. Believe me, your sincere friend. WILBUR MITCHELL, Peru, Ind.

Thanhouser Sells Plant

Syndicate Headed by C. J. Hite, of Chicago, Secures the Entire Plant and Assets—Thanhouser to Remain as Manager for a Time.

IT was intimated in a recent issue of the Moving Picture World that efforts were being made by Western picture men to secure one or more of the leading manufacturing plants associated with the Sales Company. The prediction came true last Friday, when it was announced that Mr. Edwin Thanhouser, maker of the famous Thanhouser pictures, had sold his plant to the interests mentioned.

Mr. H. E. Aitken, who is interested in a number of picture concerns, and who is supposed to have conducted the details of the deal, authorizes the following announcement:

"Mr. C. J. Hite, of Chicago, is at the head of a syndicate which has just consummated the purchase of the entire plant and assets of Thanhouser Company, makers of the famous Thanhouser films. Edwin Thanhouser still remains connected with the company as its general manager.

"Mr. Hite has been very active in the film business in the past, and is at the present largely interested in the American, Reliance and Majestic companies, and has also large interests in the H. & H. and Majestic Film exchanges in Chicago. He is now the second vice-president and director of the Mutual Film Corporation, and is a member of its executive committee."

The announcement created quite a stir among the Independents and many theories as to what the probable effect of the sale would be were indulged in by picture men generally. The purchasers are saying nothing as to what their plans are, but it is hinted that they propose to have more to say in the management of the Sales Company in future than has been accorded them in the past. In this connection it may be recorded that a general reorganization of the distributing machinery of the Independent interests is the present order of business.

Quimby's New Theatre

Zanesville, Ohio, Manager Building a Beautiful House in That City.

Despite the cold weather a big force of workmen are pushing rapidly to completion the new Casino Theater building on South Fifth Street, Zanesville, Ohio, which is being built by W. C. Quimby, one of the pioneers in the film and vaudeville game in Ohio. The building occupies a lot 67 by 142 feet. The entrance will be in the center flanked by two storerooms, the front running to the roof having 800 incandescent lights and two flaming arcs, the decorations being of marble and plastic relief work. The auditorium will have a seating capacity of 748, being 83 feet deep and 57 wide. There will be retiring rooms, free checking room, drinking fountain, free telephone service and other accommodations for the comfort and convenience of patrons.

The ventilation is to be a feature, the system used being to pull by suction fans, air through a six-foot conductor above the roof down through steam-heated coils of pipe which gives fresh hot air on the coldest nights. This system is compulsory under the new building code of Ohio, which went into effect last May. Steam heat and an indirect lighting system furnished by the X-Ray Company, of Chicago, are other nice features. The beautiful leather upholstered seats will set on a bowl-shaped floor with an 8-foot elevation. Seven 6-foot exits insuring absolute safety.

The operating room is 18 feet by 9 feet square and 10 feet high, with a 24-inch outlet to the open. It will be equipped with two Power's No. 6 machines, Iris Dissolver, spot light and electric effect machine. An extra Edison Model B machine will be set up ready for emergency. Projection will be upon a Mirroroid screen, size of picture to be 15 x 20, throw 70 feet. Screen will be set at back of stage and surrounded with scenery representing a woods and foliage. Blue and other colored bulbs will cast a faint glow upon the imitation foliage which gives a beautiful soft effect, the same having been tried in the old Quimby Theater successfully.

Although a stage has been built, the house is purely one for the presentation of the photoplay in its highest form. Three reels will comprise the program for a five and ten-cent admission. Music will be furnished by a $5,000 Wurlitzer pipe organ augmented by an orchestra. The investment will be in the neighborhood of $60,000, which looks as if some people have confidence in the future of motion pictures.

Kalem Announces Egyptian Pictures.

First Subject of a Notable Series Will Soon Be Released—Players Now in Jerusalem—More Irish Pictures.

WHEN the Kalem Company sent a company of players to Egypt all the picture world sat up and took notice. It was no small undertaking and the country to be invaded presented conditions none too favorable to such an enterprise; but the Kalem players had conquered Ireland under great difficulties and it was believed that they would be able to cope successfully with the peculiar people of Egypt. Every precaution was taken to provide against emergencies that might arise. Through the Secretary of State the assistance of the U. S. Consular agents at the points to be visited was secured. The Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions contributed the aid of its missionaries in the Nile Valley toward the success of the venture and, through other agencies, the company of players obtained a proper introduction to the sheriffs, or head men, of the Arab tribes of the upper Nile Valley. With these credentials and an experienced dragoman and interpreter to smooth out the rough places, the Kalemites journeyed up the Nile as far as Luxor, where is located many monuments of the grandeur of ancient Egypt.

The company left New York on Saturday, Dec. 2, under the direction of Mr. Sidney Olcott and including the following players: Miss Gene Gauntier, Miss Alice Hollister, Mr. Jack J. Clark, Mr. Robert Gignola, Mr. J. P. McGowan, Mr. George Hollister, cameraman; Mr. J. A. Farnum, scenic artist, and "Philly" McDonald, general utility man. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Hollister, George, Jr., and Ethel Doris, also accompanied the party.

Scimitar Dance from "The Fighting Dervishes of the Desert" (Kalem).

From time to time the Moving Picture World has recorded the progress of the Kalem players to Luxor and bits of their experience with the wild tribes of the desert. Much of what they have passed through will probably never appear in print or in the pictures, but sufficient has been told to lend great interest to their work and the pictures, when they come along, will be received with unusual applause. The first subject, "The Fighting Dervishes of the Desert," will be released in May. It is, in many ways, a remarkable picture. It is the first motion picture drama to be made in Egypt with the natives of the region, the camels and donkeys and swift horses of the desert in the picture. Real life in the desert is depicted in every scene, although American actors perform the principal parts.

The first scene opens upon one of the ancient wells of the desert with a camel turning the wheel that raises the water by means of earthen buckets. Zahrah, daughter of the Coptic high priest, is seen going to the well for water. She is observed by Hassan Ali, an Arab sheik, who falls in love with her. At another time Hassan meets Zahrah and offers to marry her; he is referred to her father, who refuses to give his consent because Christian and Mohamdan may not marry. Hassan, actuated by a desire for revenge, incites the dervishes to raid the Copts and a massacre follows in which nearly all the Copts are killed. Zahrah escapes from the church where the Copts were trapped, and is rescued by Hassan. Afterward Hassan embraces Christianity and marries Zahrah.

One of the interesting scenes is a ceremonial scimiter dance of the dervishes which is performed by the natives before their tented village on the edge of the desert. There is also a view of the ancient Temple of Thebes at Luxor.

The cast of characters is as follows:

Zahrah, Daughter of the Coptic Priest	Miss Gauntier
Hassan Ali, the Arab Sheik	Mr. Clark
Ishmail, Sheik of the Dervishes	Mr. Vignola
Father Moosa, Coptic High Priest	Mr. McGowan
Arab Runner	Mr. Farnum
Arab Envoy	Abdulla Ya Fari

The art of the players is especially well shown in their ability to simulate the Arab. It is difficult to discover the difference between the actors and the natives, so perfect is their makeup. Miss Gauntier has, with her usual adaptability, mastered the difficult feat of balancing a jar of water on her head. Bob Vignola appears as a most blood-thirsty dervish, looking like one of the natives. As the Coptic priest, Mr. McGowan could be easily mistaken for the real thing. There is really nothing wanting to complete the reality of the picture.

Scene from "The Fighting Dervishes of the Desert" (Kalem).

Kalem Players Now in Jerusalem.

The Kalem players have completed their work in Egypt and are now in Jerusalem. Thirteen pictures were taken along the Nile. The work to be done in the Holy Land is very comprehensive and will occupy the company for several months, after which they will go to Ireland for more Irish pictures.

In this connection the Kalem Company announces that it has secured the right from Mrs. Dion Boucicault to produce the "Shaughran," Dion Bouccicault's most famous production. Other Irish classic plays will also be adapted to pictures on this trip.

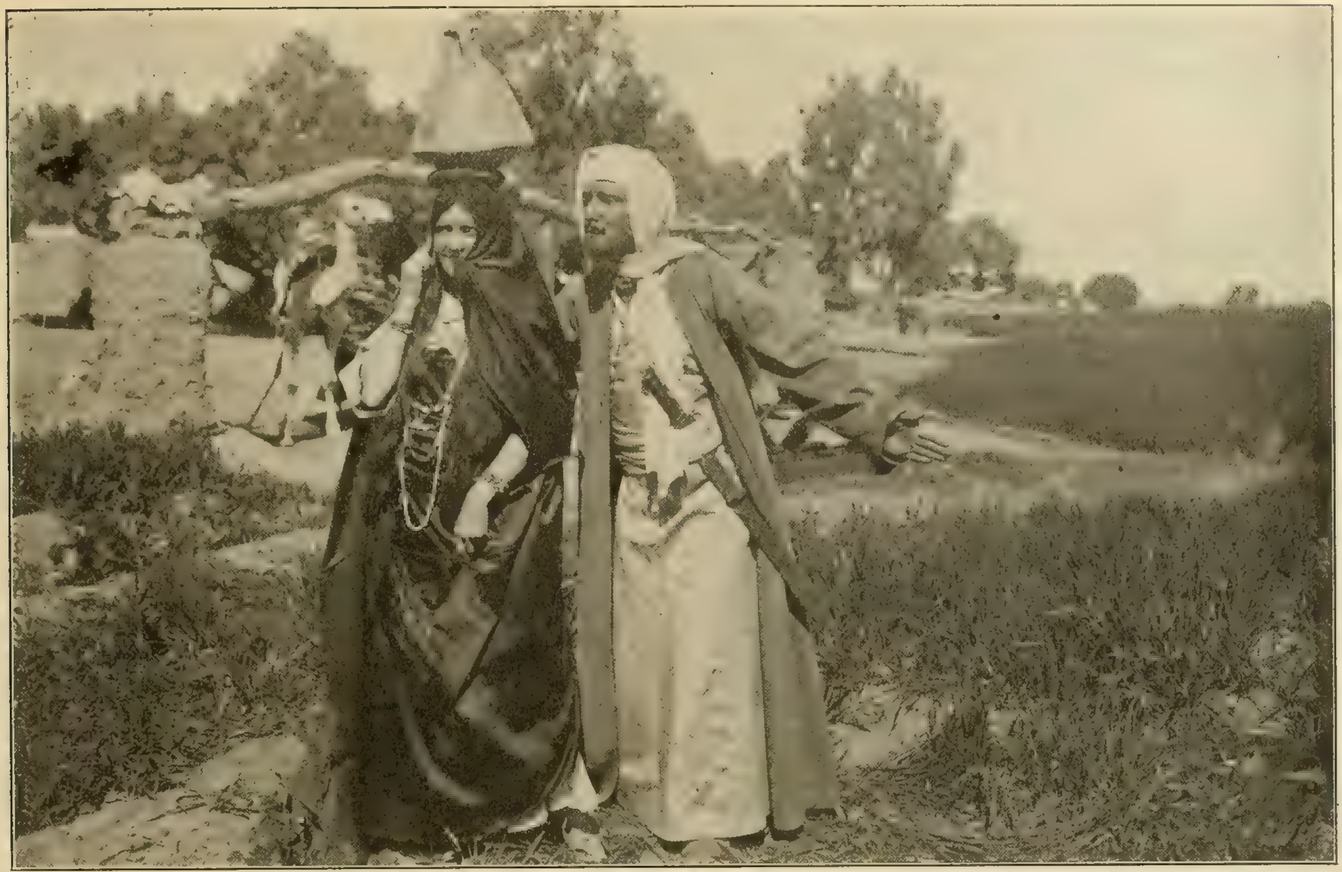
Special music and a large variety of special advertising matter will be available for the Egyptian pictures, obtainable at exchanges or advertising supply houses.

NEW SELIG BUILDING AT LOS ANGELES.

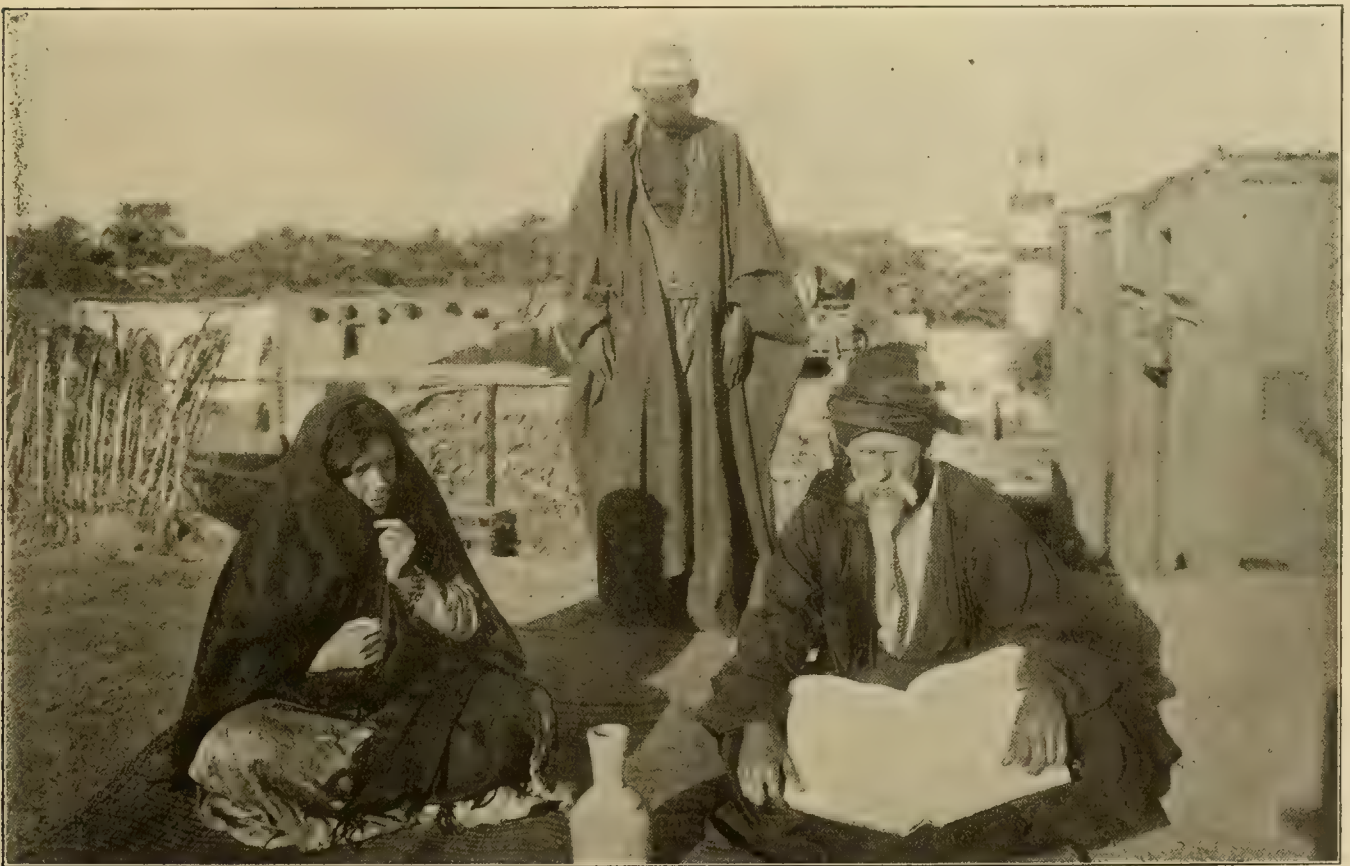
The handsome new office building of the Selig plant in Los Angeles is completed and Manager James L. McGee and his staff have moved into the handsome quarters. The concrete Mission wall has been extended around the whole property and the new gardens are being prepared, so that the plant, located among the lovely Edendale hills, is becoming one of the handsomest spots of a city famed for architectural beauty. Hordes of winter tourists pass the studio daily in the suburban cars, en route to Glendale and the famed Spanish resorts of Casa Verdugo and La Ramada, and all are profuse in their exclamations of surprise that a moving picture "factory" should spend so much space and money on beautifying its premises. The great Mission towers and the massive entrance gates with their gatekeeper always on duty give a stability and dignity to the premises which reflect favorably on the moving picture business, which a certain proportion of the public is still prone to regard lightly. The former office quarters will be converted into a green room for the players.

SOTHERN AND MARLOWE IN PICTURES.

A story is going the rounds of the daily press to the effect that Mr. E. H. Sothern and Julia Marlowe, now appearing in repertoire, contemplate giving a performance of "The Taming of the Shrew" for pictures. It is said that Miss Marlowe has become a regular picture "fan," visiting the "movies" whenever the opportunity is offered.



Miss Gauntier as "Zahrah" and Mr. Clark as "Hassan Ali" in the Kalem Egyptian Subject, "The Fighting Dervishes of the Desert."



Miss Gauntier as "Zahrah" and Mr. McGowan as "Father Moosa, the Captive Priest," in the Kalem, Egyptian Subject, "The Fighting Dervishes of the Desert."

Music for the Picture

BY CLARENCE E. SINN.

MGR. R. W. MIDGLEY, of the "Liberty Motion Picture Palace," Salt Lake City, has forwarded programs which are neat and tasteful and of interest to this department by reason of a musical program being included with that of the pictures. Licensed pictures are shown, the bill is changed twice a week, giving the musical director, Mr. Edgar Bayliss, ample time to select his music. On the back page of the program is a list of from twelve to fifteen standard musical numbers, numbered in order. In the programs sent, the musical numbers played with each picture are marked with a pen at the top of the synopsis of said picture. For example, Selig's "The Brotherhood of Man" is marked "10, 11 and 12." Turning to the music program we find the corresponding numbers to be "La Tambo" (Dillea), "Fabio Romani, Overture" (Isenman) and "Chanson san Paroles" (Tschaikowsky). These programs are of a high grade of music throughout, with just enough of the popular stuff interspersed to add variety. The natural inference is that Manager Midgley has a house so well lighted that his programs may be read during the performance.

From "The Marvel" theater, Frederick, Md., newspaper clippings are sent showing a similar plan of announcing the picture music, with the exception that these programs are printed in the daily paper. The musical director, Miss Maude Waters Dittmar, shows considerable circumspection in selecting appropriate numbers, which are published along with the synopsis. Independent pictures are shown. Among those submitted are: "I Wish I Had a Girl" (Imp), with popular song accompaniment, like "I Want a Girl," etc. "The Christian Martyr" (Gaumont) is accompanied by "Oratorio-Elijah" ("If With All Their Hearts," "Lord God of Abraham," "Baal, We Cry to Thee," "Be Not Afraid" and "O Rest in the Lord").

For those who do not work out their pictures in detail these programs will offer hints worth considering. As observed, they do not pretend to follow the pictures as to scene and situation, but only as to the general character of the photoplay taken as a whole. Indeed, although I like detail work applied to picture music, yet there are many pictures which do not readily adapt themselves to this treatment. Take the Gaumont "Christian Martyrs" for example; it will be found that a general atmosphere in keeping with the spirit of the picture is best sustained by such music as Miss Dittmar suggests. And this is true of many of the better class of pictures. High grade overtures, symphonies and other standard works will often sustain the dignity of a classical picture when attention to minor details might cheapen it.

Of the ordinary dramatic pictures which at present predominate the field, I must say that I prefer to "work them up" in detail when such a thing is possible. In quickly shifting scenes of short duration such as the Biograph Co. makes a specialty of it is often better to play to the predominating theme and ignore the other. This suggestion I offered more than a year ago, and have seen no reason to modify it as yet. However, as repeatedly pointed out, each picture carries its own little problems and must be humored accordingly.

Patriotic and war pictures generally are helped by attention to details as suggested by the different scenes. Also some classical pictures. It all depends on the picture. It is evident, however, that a straight "concert" program relieves the mind of the musician of much worry, for it is really no joke to follow a picture closely and intelligently with appropriate music. On the other hand, a good concert number is often a welcome addition to the performance and an added attraction to the house. I believe they should be interspersed with judgment, but not used exclusively.

The following suggestions are offered:

"How Washington Crossed the Delaware" (Edison).

1. Third movement in "Raymond Overture" or any semi-military music; continue till caption: "His Signal—The Hoot of an Owl."
2. Mysterious till kitchen scene.
3. Neutral (something of the intermezzo type) till change.
4. A few chords on the piano in imitation of her playing; then
5. Allegretto till change.
6. Something in the ballad style to conform with his singing and playing. Continue till he stops.
7. Agitato (soft) till change.
8. Agitato (a little heavier) till "Washington Crossing the Delaware."
9. Semi-mysterious (like the first movement in "Pique Dame" overture—through four scenes) till "The Small Body of Hessians."
10. Lively music (for banquet scene—short) till combat.
11. Hurry till end of combat.
12. March movement to finish.

    (I have not included any American patriotic airs, as none we are familiar with had been written at the period in which this picture was laid, or were known under other titles. For example, "My Country 'Tis of Thee" was "God Save the King" at that time. However, those who are not over critical may introduce "Flag Music" after No. 9 and at finish of picture.)

"The Seventh Son" (Vitagraph).

1. Religioso till end of prayer; modulate into a few bars of soft, semi-plaintive till "A Plan to Frighten Their Brother."
2. Mysterious till "Fort Sumter Fired Upon."
3. "The Battle Cry of Freedom" (old song) or some march movement till "Four of the Widow's Sons Go to War."
4. "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp, the Boys are Marching" (old song) till "Making Bandages."
5. Pathetic till "Good-Bye, Mother, Don't Worry."
6. Tolstoi's "Good-Bye" till "News of the Battle of Bull Run."
7. "The Battle Cry of Freedom" softly till telegram is shown.
8. Pathetic till "A Council of War."
9. "Red, White and Blue" (or any patriotic air) till "Two More Are Killed."
10. Hurry (heavy for battle) till "Panic Stricken, etc."
11. Agitato (softly but fast) till "The Sixth Son Dies."
12. Plaintive till "For Her Only Surviving Son."
13. Very pathetic till Lincoln takes tablet from her.
14. "My Country 'Tis of Thee" (softly in a pathetic manner), swell when picture of graves is shown, then subdue till final tableau. Then forte till close.

"The Illumination" (Vitagraph).

This is best accompanied by sacred music or at least music of a religious character throughout. Sullivan's "Love Not the World," Handel's "Largo," Mozart's "Priest's March," and the numbers suggested by Miss Dittmar in the letter quoted above are all appropriate. An organ, even though it be a common reed organ, will add to the effect. A great storm scene is shown beginning with the caption "And the Sun Was Darkened, etc." and ending with "And So They Went and Made the Sepulchre, etc." This may be accented by music of a turbulent nature with crescendo rolls on the bass drum or tympanni, if you have them). The storm scene from "William Tell" will answer admirably. If you haven't got that or something as good, you may substitute a bass solo with tremolo accompaniment for the right hand, which permits you to make the crescendos easily. An ordinary melodramatic "hurry" would probably cheapen the quality of your work. If you have nothing else, however, try and pick out something that sounds as impressive as possible.

MUSIC FOR CINES SUBJECT, "JOSEPHINE."

By S. L. Rothapfel.

At the opening of picture play "Sunshine and Shadow" waltz, with spirit, until Josephine's husband and children are arrested; then break into "Marsellaise." Play pianissimo until mob breaks into room, then crescendo. Continue until mob leaves room; gradually diminish as Josephine has vision of her husband's death.

Crescendo again at the sub-title "After the Death of Robespierre, Josephine and Her Two Children Are Liberated." Play with spirit until sub-title "Josephine Is Introduced to Bonaparte, Then a Common Artillery Officer."

Resume "Sunshine and Shadow" waltz, continue until subtitle "The Members of the French National Assembly Are Evicted by Bonaparte's Grenadiers," then run into "Marseillaise." Play until sub-title "The Religious Marriage of Napoleon and Josephine on the Eve of the Coronation Day," then play "Pomp and Circumstance," march, Elgar, very slow tempo, first movement. By repeating this movement it will just about bring you to the ceremony. Swing into second movement, play with very slow tempo until sub-title "Napoleon Announces to the State Council His Decision to Divorce Josephine."

Resume "Sunshine and Shadow, waltz, pianissimo, until Napoleon hands Josephine letter.

As she reads mute all strings and play with great feeling, "Simple Aveu"; this is to be continued throughout the balance of the picture and can be used with crescendo where Napoleon shows the new-born baby to the populace, but must diminish again as Josephine reads the letter which advises her that a new heir is born.

This arrangement is made after a practical demonstration and will be found very efficient and simple, only four numbers being used in the entire picture; can be played effectively with piano, organ or orchestra of any number of pieces. The best effect will be obtained by a pipe organ, piano, two violins, 'cello, flute, clarinet, trombone, cornet and tympani. If lecturer is used mute all instruments.

SUGGESTIONS FOR "THE SEVENTH SON."

By Manuel Komroff.

I. "Home Sweet Home" as they are all together.
II. "The Battle Cry of Freedom" as the war breaks out.
III. "Tramp! Tramp! Tramp! The Boys Are Marching" as the first two sons march away.
IV. "Soldiers' Farewell" as the next two leave.
V. Play No. III as the sixth son goes to the front.
VI. "Just Before the Battle Mother" as the seventh son becomes a deserter and runs away.
VII. Dramatic, as he is court-martialed.
VIII. "America" for the scene in the White House.
IX. "The Last Rose of Summer" as she talks to President Lincoln.
X. "We're Tenting To-night" as she shows the President the photo of the graves of her other six sons.
XI. "America" as he grants the pardon.

Always consider your audience; try and give them the kind of music they desire. The popular taste is not always classical, in fact seldom does it run above the semi-classical, which is that kind of classical music that has become popular. For instance. Mendelssohn's "Spring Song," or Rubinstein's "Melody in F" are both selections of classical music that have grown popular. I have found that audiences as a rule like this kind of music in preference to the new classical or ragtime music. Although you perhaps may prefer the pure classical—and have good reasons to back up your taste, yet you should consider the audience and try to give them what they want.

I have found that audiences do not care to have new music tried out on them while the pictures are in motion, but would rather have music that they are familiar with. If possible have the music of such a character as to tell the thought in the picture. For example, supposing we have a war picture and soldiers are marching across the screen, you may play Schubert's military march, which would carry out the idea in the picture. but I have found it ever so much more effective to play "Tramp! Tramp! Tramp! The Boys Are Marching," which also has the same idea, but is better known to the audience.

A bad habit that many pianists have is the playing of selection over and over again. Of course sometimes a tune will appeal to us and we will hum or whistle that tune over and over, sometimes for days, and we are often glad to get over it. Musicians should be careful not to catch this; at any rate do not play the same thing over and over, consider the audience.

VAIL EXPLAINS.

Editor, Moving Picture World:—

Dear Sir: My article, entitled "Playing the Pictures," which appeared not long ago, seems to have been sadly misunderstood by one of your correspondents, whose letter was printed in a later issue of the "World." The list of music which I enclosed was, I admit, largely classical, but it was not intended to be fully representative of the daily programmes which I prepare for the pictures. The exceptionally heavy pieces which it contains are for use in playing exceptionally heavy reels—it is easy enough to pick up light music for the "fillers." For every classical number that appears on my programmes there are two selections from musical comedies like The Red Mill, The Balkan Princess, The Enchantress, and dozens of others; three or four good waltzes, such as Gold and Silver; Spring, Beautiful Spring; Valse Septembre, etc., and frequently a couple of snappy and recently published "rags." In such a varied programme every class of reel from "The Fall of Troy" to a "Foolshead" can be given the treatment it deserves.

Leaving my personal abilities out of the question, I wish to challenge most emphatically the absurd notion that any music ever written is too good or too "classical" for playing the better class of feature reels. Heavy music is ridiculous when played for a crockery-smashing farce, but popular, or even light classical music for "Hamlet" is as incongruous as an interpolated buck-and-wing dance by the venerable Polonius. The work involved in carefully adapting the best music (for the purpose), to subtle dramatic situations, in making it speak the language of the characters, in carefully preserving the mediaeval or antique spirit of the setting—all this calls for the very highest kind of musical culture. Not a week passes without bringing with it some picture which calls for music that is difficult to obtain and both physically and mentally exhausting to play. Were I possessed of double my present modest sum of technical equipment, I should still feel that I was not "wasting my genius" (!) in a moving-picture theatre.

LEWIS GIVES A FEW SUGGESTIONS.

To the Editor of The Moving Picture World.

Dear Sir: Being a constant reader of The Moving Picture World, which I, among thousands, call the height of perfection, I would like to say a few words in regard to music for the picture. It is my belief that the time is not far away, when every pianist will have to be able to properly accompany the picture as a vaudeville player does with every act. The pianist that has for his repertoire a few of the popular hits and a few sets of waltzes will soon find out that managers are waking up to the idea of playing the pictures properly.

I find my best help in The Moving Picture World, and find the musical suggestions fine. I also read the advance stories of the film and find it one of the best helps. I have also always sent for the Kalem special music and I recommend it very highly. Mr. Simons' ideas are much the same as mine and I think if anyone does not know how to play for the pictures it would pay them to get one of the special music sheets, and work up every picture from that.

Last Friday we had Vitagraph's "Illumination" and, in order to understand every part of it, we went to the exchange and brought the reel before 10 o'clock and had the operator run it through twice for us. The first time we watched it through very carefully and then arranged our musical program, which consisted of, for the opening, "The Lord Is My Shepherd," until the blind man is cured, then into Millard's "Ave Maria" until the sign called "Calvary," then into "Calvary" until the crucifixion, then into "Ashamed of Jesus." From here until the Resurrection we used "Weber's Mass in G." After the Resurrection we used "I Know That My Redeemer Liveth," then into "The Palms" until the end, letting the organ (which we used all the way through the reel) slowly die away. With the chimes that were used twice in the reel, it made a very good effect.

We received many favorable comments on our work. I can't understand how a manager would book such a picture if it had to be accompanied by the popular hits of the day.

The next best thing in the business in my estimation is the trap drummer and effect man. Our house claims the best in the city and I doubt if there are any better in the state. A drummer, like a pianist, can improve or mar the picture by poor judgment.

Wishing The Moving Picture World the same success it has always known, and that this will not take too much of your valuable time, I will close.

With best wishes to The World, P. E. LEWIS,
Paterson, N. J.

WORCESTER, MASS., CHURCH PUTS IN PICTURES.

Mr. Bernard M. Corbett, of the Edison Company, writes from Buffalo that he has equipped the lecture room of Grace M. E. Church, Worcester, Mass., with a Model "B" Edison machine which will be used there permanently. Mr. Corbett supervised the first exhibition, consisting of the following reels: "The Man Who Learned" (Edison); "Pathe Weekly;" "U. S. Army Aviators" (Lubin); "A Mid-Winter Night's Dream" (Lubin); "Eugene Wrayburn" (from "Our Mutual Friend"), by Charles Dickens (Edison).

CHICAGO LETTER.

By Jas. S. McQuade.

I RECEIVED an interesting letter recently from my friend Frank L. Hough, Jr., of the Edison Kinetograph department, who has traveled quite extensively through the far Northwest for several months past. In Butte, Montana, the Orpheum, owned and managed by the Casto Bros., is the leading house, and Mr. Hough speaks of these gentlemen as being up-to-date exhibitors. The Montana Amusement Co. is building a new house in Butte, of the Orpheum type. They also own several small houses in the Montana metropolis and in the smaller towns throughout the state.

In Spokane, the leading houses are the Casino and the Clem, both owned by Dr. Clemmer, who is an enterprising exhibitor. Both these houses, Mr. Hough writes, are modern, and finely appointed and equipped. Mr. Leoi, who owns the Arcade, is another enterprising exhibitor in Spokane. He is very enthusiastic in his outlook for the future of the business and promises some big things in the exhibition end, in the near future. Sam Cohn, who runs the Spokane Theater, an old, legitimate house that never paid its owners, is doing a big business with first-run pictures and a few vaudeville acts.

Mr. Clemmer, of Seattle, a brother of Dr. Clemmer, of Spokane, is building a first-class picture theater that will seat 1,200 people. It is thoroughly modern and high class picture programs will be given in it. Another new house, called the Melbourne, is now under way. This will also be a high class motion picture theater. It is understood that J. D. Williams, of Sydney, Australia, is interested in this house. Eugene Levy, of Seattle, has gained the sobriquet of "Motion Picture King" in the Puget Sound city. He is a live advertiser and always gets good results. In addition to owning several small houses, he runs the Grand, the old legitimate house built by John Cort. The Grand offers pictures and vaudeville and is showing to big business. The town of Everett, north of Seattle, was also visited by Mr. Hough. Alec Singlelo has the business well in hand there. His picture theater is described as a model place, his programs as well balanced and his pictures well projected.

In writing about conditions in Vancouver, B. C., Mr. Hough states: "Mr. Muir, of the Dominion Theater, is the manager who considers nothing too good for his patrons. His house is beautiful and one would never think that such a place could be found in the Canadian Northwest. The house is perfection in every way. I was astonished when I walked into the place. The pictures are accompanied by an excellent orchestra and a large pipe organ. This country out here is brimful of things in the picture business that never fail to astonish an Eastern man. Exhibitors are absolutely up to the minute, and then some."

In Portland, Oregon, Mr. Hough met Melvin G. Winstock, general manager of the People's Amusement Co. As an exhibitor, Mr. Winstock is par excellence, in Mr. Hough's estimation. He looks after a circuit of sixteen houses and every house is a model. The People's and Star are the two largest houses in Portland, and offer pictures exclusively. Mr. Winstock makes it a point to give his patrons the very best, with the result that he has the best people in the city among his patrons. Mr. Hough writes that it is a rare treat to meet an exhibitor of Mr. Winstock's type, and that there is positive encouragement given by the experience. The People's Amusement Co. use Licensed pictures exclusively. Speaking generally, Mr. Hough states that the motion picture business in the far Northwest is in the hands of men of a high type of intelligence, who are building the business on a solid basis.

Moving Pictures in Political Campaign.

Samuel Alschuler, of Aurora, Ill., candidate for the Democratic nomination for governor of Illinois, was the originator of the greatest novelty that the late campaign has produced. Mr. Alschuler decided to enlist the aid of the film in conducting his fight. He found that he could not visit all sections of the state in the time allotted him and, as he had planned, a moving picture campaign for all Illinois cities was decided on.

The stage was set for a regular old campaign meeting, with chairman, pitcher of ice water on the table, a flag draped over the stirring scene, and all the rest of it. The pictures were run off without a hitch. The chairman, in a brief address was shown introducing Mr. Alschuler, who stepped to the front of the stage, bowing his acknowledgment of the greeting extended him by the audience, and then plunged into his speech.

After a few remarks Mr. Alschuler is seen to retire gracefully, after shaking hands with the chairman and the prominent citizens on the stage, hurrying away presumably to address another meeting.

Edison Home Kinetoscope.

I had the pleasure of witnessing a demonstration of the Edison Home Kinetoscope in the Sherman House last week, on the invitation of Adolph F. Gall, staff engineer of the Thomas A. Edison laboratory. It was really a surprise to find that this machine, which one, at first sight, might take for a toy, projected moving pictures with a clearness and definition fully equal to that of a regulation projecting machine. The pictures run off were dramatic and educational, the latter especially claiming close attention, as it is expected that the Home Kinetoscope will be widely used in schools and colleges, as well as in homes.

An examination of the film used in this machine showed that, instead of having only one picture on its width, as in the regulation film, it has three. The reels vary in length from 10 to 80 feet, in increments of 10 feet. There are 70 pictures on one foot single row and, therefore, 210 pictures on one foot, when the three rows of pictures are included. The pictures on the right and left rows go to the edge of the film, the sprocket holes being located so as to separate them from the center row of pictures.

When the machine is in operation the pictures on the left row are first projected. When the end of that row is reached, by a simple adjustment the center row is next shown, the machine being operated as in rewinding. When the beginning of the film is again reached, the adjustment referred to brings the right row of pictures on the screen, the machine being operated directly until the end. Thus a film used by the Home Kinetoscope passes before the lens three times, for its entire length. Eighty feet of such film is equivalent to 1,000 feet of standard film, in picture value. The width of the film is seven-eighths of an inch, the regular film being 1⅜ inches.

There are three sources of illumination for the Home Kinetoscope, viz.: acetylene gas, the Nernst electric lamp and the baby arc lamp. The current fom an ordinary electric lamp in the room was used in the demonstration I attended. The machine can also be used for lantern slides, the slides being one-half the regulation size and each having 10 views—five above and five below the median line.

An Important Appointment.

John F. Pribyl, connected with Street & Smith's magazines for ten years in responsible capacities and recently general manager of the New Story Magazine for that firm in Chicago, has been appointed the personal representative of William N. Selig, president of the Selig Polyscope Company.

Mr. Pribyl will enter upon his new duties on April 15th. He has now resided in Chicago for two years and has formed a wide circle of friends, who admire him for his ability and sterling integrity.

Mr. Pribyl has an extensive acquaintance with authors, literary men and members of the theatrical profession, qualifications that will be specially valuable to him in the new field he has entered.

It is reported on good authority that Chas. J. Hite, of the H. & H. & Majestic Film exchanges, this city, has purchased the Thanhouser Co.'s plant and effects from Edwin Thanhouser and wife. The deal was consummated on Friday, April 15th. Mr. Thanhouser will remain in charge of the production for some time to come. The same interests now controlling the Thanhouser also control the Majestic Film Co. and the Reliance.

F. Bartholomae was a caller at the World office recently and stated that he is building a new house, the Drexel, 63rd St. near Cottage Grove, with 700 capacity. The house will be finished about May 20 at a cost of $50,000. High class Licensed pictures with fine instrumental music and spotlight singers will form the program.

A. Powell, formerly of Kokomo, Ind., was a visitor at the World office last week. Mr. Powell will open up a newly-built up-to-date house at 59th St. and Center Ave., this city, on or about Saturday, April 13th. The World wishes Mr. Powell all success in his new venture.

W. W. Watts, of the Vaudette, Springfield, Ill., was in the city Tuesday, April 3rd. He reports good business in the capital city but complains that he is not getting enough special films to suit his customers. Mr. Watts charges 5 cents for regular shows and 10 cents for specials and features. The General Film Co.'s branch, St. Louis, furnishes his service.

The Moving Picture Educator

A GREAT HUMANITARIAN.

ONE of the greatest principles in all civilization is that which embraces the whole human family and seeks to do the greatest good for the greatest number. Rescuing the perishing, delivering those held by affliction or disease, the alleviation and further prevention of suffering. Anything which aids in any or all of these works commands the highest esteem. The cinematograph again has proved its adaptability; hitherto equal to every demand, it is constantly creating new channels of usefulness and power. Publicity is often spoken of as the great enlightener, but publicity cannot illustrate and reveal actual conditions, consequently it sinks into helplessness and uselessness. Such cannot happen to the power of the cinematograph; in revelation and illustration it is constantly increasing in power at present. While revealing conditions in every social aspect, it has recently been especially useful in portraying evils relative to the most important and trying ills assailing the human family. The New York School of Philanthropy recently held a special exhibition of moving pictures in which evils under the following conditions were revealed: child labor, drink, convict labor, tenement houses, tuberculosis, etc. The first picture shown was called "For the Commonwealth."

This film was taken especially by a moving picture company in co-operation with the National Committee on Prison Labor. It showed the story of an unskilled laborer who cannot get work. He deserts his wife and is arrested. In prison he learns the shoemaking trade, and on his release is able to furnish a good home for his wife and baby, who had to go to the poorhouse when he went to prison. The film was used by the national committee to show how shirtmaking in State prisons throws thousands of hard-working women out of employment.

The next picture was prepared under the auspices of the National Child Labor Committee and was entitled

"Children of Labor."

It pointed out the conditions existing in factories where thousands of small girls and boys are employed. A representative of the committee said one of the worst features of the child-labor evil is it throws the fathers of the children out of work. The film showed a manufacturer's daughter lost and taken into the home of a workman. The family which adopts her is poor, and she is forced to go to work in a mill which her father buys. Everything ends happily when she is found by her parents. The father abolishes child labor in his mills.

The Division of Recreation of the Russell Sage Foundation had prepared a film entitled

"Charlie Reforms."

Charlie loves a girl, but he has a hard time wooing her, because her father and mother and little sisters and brother insist on being with them all the time. He takes to drink. One night he sees Mamie going to the town Social Centre with a young man. He follows them into the building. Instead of being arrested he is received kindly. Just for that he stops drinking, gets his old position back, becomes an estimable citizen again and gets the use of the front parlor without having mama and papa around.

The National Kindergarten Association had prepared a suitable film with a happy ending called

"At the Threshold of Life."

A young millionaire's auto runs over a little cripple. In the hospital, over the little boy's bed, the young millionaire gives a big check to the order of the association and is reunited with his sweetheart. They separated when she refused his automobile trips to take up settlement work.

Probably the most interesting picture shown was that prepared by the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis—

"The Awakening of John Bond."

John Bond, a politician, indifferent to the health of his constituents, marries. His bride, in nursing a sailor aboard their yacht, contracts consumption. All the private sanatoriums in the city are crowded and the husband sends his wife to a public one. She is cured there, and everything ends happily, Bond showing his gratitude with a $10,000 check made payable to the national organization.

The whole exhibition was of a very high order, calculated not only to increase the value of the work of the various philanthropic societies but opening up the fact that now, by the aid of the moving picture, they can as never before educate the public on the great questions of these national evils, and even as the light of the sun is death to evils of corruption in Nature so the light of the cinematograph will mean death to the many evils which have long eaten into the social life of various classes of society. The efforts and results of the moving picture as an educator are daily becoming more apparent and consequently more appreciated everywhere where the good of the people is the object sought.

HIGHER VERSUS HIGHEST EDUCATION.

"The program of the International Congress of Mathematics, which is to meet this year, includes a discussion on the dangerous tendency of certain teachers to make the study of mathematics attractive."

This statement made in the interest of higher education is recognized as possessing limitations bordering on narrowness that stamp it at once as not being of the highest order. The highest education is now universally admitted to be attractive. Referring to the above quotation, an eminent authority replies: "In the same way some old pedagogs, greatly attached to intellectual gymnastics, fear that the moving picture may make all studies too easy."

Happily the pessimistic view of the inexcusable old-fashioned ones is the exception rather than the rule. It is a common report from all parts of the educational world that the only thing which stands in the way of the immediate adoption of the cinematograph is the initial expense. While authorities are reflecting upon ways and means to meet the necessary expenditure and also to make such structural changes as required by laws of safety, there are many individual instances of the installation and use of the moving picture for lecture and teaching purposes.

In Versailles, France, perhaps the most thorough and practical beginning has been made, and under the guidance of Professor Bruchert, what is described as a "model plant" is used to teach botany, geology and zoology.

While reference is made to the "model plant" in Versailles it must not be supposed that other schools have not been commenced in like manner. England and America have several, perhaps a little less thorough than in France, yet none the less progressive and perhaps with more than equal ambitions and determinations. It is not widely known, but it is nevertheless a fact, that most elaborate preparations are being made by several of the more capable film manufacturers for the production of pictures of thorough, practical and interesting educational value. One firm has a party crossing Africa from south to north working upon perhaps the most valuable series of pictures ever yet taken. Another firm is working on a series the nature of which has not yet been made public, its very secretiveness suggesting its elaborate nature.

The illustrating or reproducing in pictures of a notable and particular literary course is taking the attention of still another firm; while others are working in an unrevealed manner, each in a line peculiar to their own conditions. In perhaps one year from now the results of these preparations will come to the light of publicity, and a mighty impetus to the cause of the highest educational functions of the moving picture will immediately result.

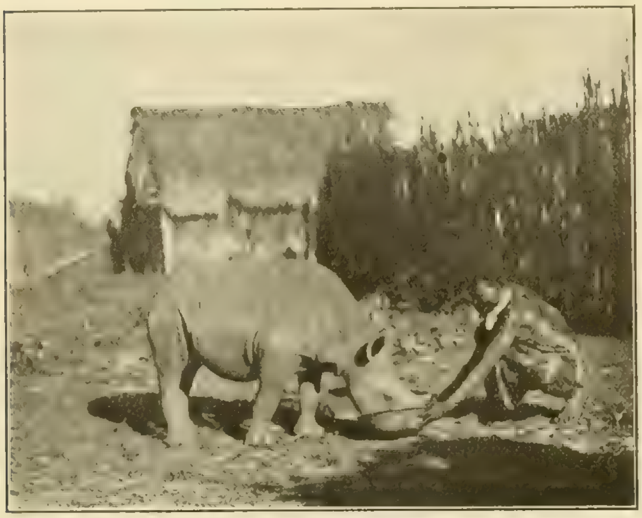
A. L. Helton, of Kendalville, Ind., has sold the Princess Theater in that city, and has purchased the state rights of "Twenty Years in Sing Sing" for the states of California, Oregon and Nevada, and will begin immediately exhibiting these pictures in these states. Mr. John Snyder is the new owner of the Princess.

The Paul Rainey African Pictures.

A Truly Wonderful Set of Perilous Nature Studies Taken in Darkest Africa.

The difficulties of securing good moving pictures in the heart of Africa are quite well known. The shortcomings of the photography in the Roosevelt pictures and Buffalo Jones pictures (both made by the same man), have caused most exhibitors to be skeptical regarding any moving pictures purporting to have been taken in Africa. That is a great pity. The pity lies in the fact that the first poor photographs may have a harmful effect upon the sale of later work which is really first class.

The Paul Rainey African pictures, which arrived in America during January, of 1912, are moving pictures that are destined to go down in the archives of many governments as an authentic record in the study of natural history. The photographs are bright and clear, and as good as it is possible to make in the bright tropical sunlight. Moreover, the views we get of the various animals are not the short and irritating glimpses that have heretofore characterized wild animal pictures. Each view gives a good, long look at the various animals, and a chance to study their ways and habits. The pictures show that many heretofore accepted notions of African animals are a fallacy. Animals that we had often been told were the most timid of creatures, appear quite at their ease in mixed company; while those ferocious animals that are commonly supposed to devour everything in sight, are really quite peaceable citizens of the jungle.



A Pet Rhino.

Cheetah Treed by Dogs.

The camera work for these pictures was done by Mr. J. C. Hemment, of New York, the well-known animal photographer and adventurer. His work stands out, head and shoulders over anything of the kind that has heretofore been attempted in Africa. He does not waste his ammunition. He does not start his camera going until there is something in front of it worth taking. He does not believe in photographing objects half a mile away. If the animal is not within 60-foot range he does not get his picture taken.

We had the pleasure of looking at eight reels of this work during the week. It is probable that the film will be "pruned" down to five or six reels, leaving only the most interesting parts. As these pictures will be put into general circulation as a special feature and state rights proposition, for the benefit of those who are interested in it we will give a brief synopsis of the reels as they were seen. Again we remind the exhibitor that they will probably be "pruned" down.

Synopsis of Reels.

Reel 1.—Safari leaving Nairoba. Unloading dogs and horses from the train at Kajabi. Dogs crossing Garranack River. Loading camels. Samoli at the Iseola River. Camel Safari crossing Gusonyro River. Ku-Ku-Yu boys bathing in Gusonyro River. Safari leaving Archer's Post for the Desert.

Reel 2.—Catching young ostriches as they are seen on the Athi plains. The same birds three weeks later. Ostriches in the mating season. A new dance—The Ostrich Trot. Preparing to leave Deep Dale for a leopard hunt. Dogs attacking Cheetah in a tree. The dogs drive Cheetah off the tree. The dogs bring Cheetah to earth and kill him. Celebrating the leopard hunt.

Reel 3.—Professor Heller setting traps for Hyena. Striped Hyena tracks. Bringing a case in which the Hyena is to be shipped to New York. The "tomb" of the natives in his private coach, starts on 10,000 mile journey to New York Zoo. Miss Tarlton and her baby Candonic. The baby Rhino caught in the Aphi River.

Reel 4.—Rhino at the water hole. A fight between two rhinos; Mrs. Giraffe as referee. The baboons, impala and monkeys at the water hole. The rhino and his guardians, the tick birds. Elephants among the trees. Elephants at the water hole.

Reel 5.—Practically the same as reel four.

Reel 6.—The breaking up of Sunset Camp at early morning. Up a tree looking for rhinos. Thompson Gazelles on the plains. A herd of Zebra. Oryx on the plains. Tracking a rhino. Instanding the Oxen at Grant's Glade. Ready for stop down Grant's Glade. Ready to cross Grant's Glade. Up the incline of Grant's Glade.

Reel 7.—Coronation Day—Somali Dance. Panorama of Archer's Post. The beginning of the desert. In camp. Kavaronda crane. Wives of Tabuayle chief. Tug-of-war between Wahkandas and Kavaronda. Skawhetlas and Somalis. Families of district commissioners throwing pennies to the natives to scramble for.

Reel 8.—Pet monkey playing in camp with Dr. Johnson and Mr. Rainey. Marsai chiefs report a lion a few miles distant. Leaving camp for the hunt. Dogs trailing through the Donga. A lioness at bay.

Intimate Studies of Nature.

Reel four is the most interesting of the lot. It shows nature in all its innocence. It is a gathering of the jungle creatures at the water hole. Mr. Hemment informed the writer that this particular water hole was the only one within sixty miles, and that the jungle beasts, wild and tame, are obliged to come there to drink. The lion does not stalk abroad in day time, but waits until sundown to come forth for water and prey. The timid animals know this and take advantage of the mid-day sun to come out for water. All kinds and species assemble at the water hole with a common purpose, and there we see a sight which reminds us of Noah's Ark. The tall giraffe is seen mingling with the rhinoceros, the gazelle, the zebra, the elephant, the oryx, and the wild boar. On the ground are many baboons and on the backs of the larger animals perch hundreds of tick birds. To see all these creatures together in one picture is a remarkable sight; one that will interest any man, woman or child.

We learn many things from these pictures. Two full-grown rhinos are seen fighting, goring each other fearfully, but seemingly without damage. We observe that the giraffe is a terrific kicker. We find also that the wild boar is a very timid animal and afraid of a gazelle or a monkey. We learn that the monkey has just as good a time in Africa as we had always supposed he did. The water hole is a sunken spring and the animals are obliged to dig for water. All ranks are leveled at the spring. The largest and the smallest must come and dig for water. Self-preservation is the first law of nature. They are compelled to put aside their fears and come out into the open, or die of thirst. It is pleasing to note how well these creatures get on together. All species are at peace in the strange assemblage. Size only gives precedence. The small animals make way for the large ones at the spring. The elephant takes the right of way over the rhino; the rhino crowds out the giraffe, while the giraffe kicks Mr. Zerba out of the way, as the zebra kicks the antelope away from the drinking place. The monkey drinks whenever he can get a chance.

There is much local color to the pictures, including hundreds of natives and many native scenes. In the hunting party were only five white men, Mr. Rainey, Mr. Hemmet, Prof. Heller, taxidermist of the Smithsonian Institute; Dr. Johnson, and Mr. Shelley. One of the reels records a leopard hunt, in which a leopard is treed by dogs and later is killed by them. A very interesting picture, indeed. Another reel shows a lioness brought to bay by dogs. It is understood that these pictures are to be on exhibition at the Lyceum Theater, New York City, for a week, and perhaps more, beginning April 15th. Mr. Hemmet, the photographer, will be on hand to lecture the pictures. Exhibitors are advised to drop in and look them over.

Frederick Guest has resigned from the Champion Company.

"THE SEWER" (Solax—2 reels).

An underground narrative of the underworld, rather gruesome and morbid in character, but not without a certain interest. Its theme is out of the ordinary. The first part of it is so nearly like "Oliver Twist" that the reviewer was sure there was a mistake in the title. Even the young pickpocket's name was Oliver, so one might be pardoned for thinking of Dickens, especially when the "gang" boosted young Oliver through the window of the rich man's home.

The play opens in an underground den of thieves. Two lads are being taught the art of picking the pockets of a dummy, by a ruffian, when a well-dressed crook appears and makes a deal with the gang to go on an expedition. Oliver, one of the boys, is taken along and is sent into the house, where he is caught by the wealthy occupant. This man, after calling the police, listened to the boy's tale with much pity, and he decided to let him go before the police arrived. Before doing so, however, he showed the boy how to break a coin in two and make a saw out of the halves, in case he should ever have to saw his way out of any place.

The well-dressed crook was not so easily to be baffled as one might suppose. After hearing Oliver's story he decided that the object of his revenge was soft-hearted, and that he would work upon his sympathies, luring him thus to his fate. A fake note was delivered in person by the gentlemanly crook to the man. It purported to come from a poor invalid, and begged for aid. The good man went at once, but he walked blindly into a den of ruffians who quickly overpowered him and relieved him of his valuables. Having no further use for him, the desparadoes decided to get rid of him by lowering him through a trap door into a sub-cellar directly beneath. Securely bound, they lowered the victim into this foul place and abandoned him to his fate.

Little Oliver had not forgotten the lesson of the broken coin, and as they lowered his friend to the underground labyrinth, he managed to slip a broken coin into his pocket, together with a key and note, telling of a secret door leading from the cellar to the sewer. The balance of the picture shows us the wanderings of this man through silent streets of underground filth. These scenes are very well done. They give the beholder a good idea of the elaborate sewerage system of a great city. The perspective is very good, indeed.

At last the victim makes his escape through a man-hole in the street, and finds his way to a police station. Accompanied by the captain and a squad of reserves, a descent is made upon the den and the thieves are rounded up in short order. Oliver and the other boy are adopted by the persecuted gentleman, and a year later we see them all happy together on his wife's birthday.

WANT PICTURES FOR SOCIOLOGICAL CONGRESS.

Motion pictures are expected to be an important feature of the Southern Sociological Congress to be held in Nashville, Tenn., May 7 to 10. Governor Ben. W. Hooper has issued a call to the governors of sixteen Southern States to send delegates to a congress and exhibition "to study and improve social, civic and economic conditions in the South." The program will be made up of an array of the strongest speakers on social welfare topics from various parts of the country. In addition there will be exhibits and a special showing of graphic methods in teaching and interesting people. For this purpose national organizations possessing motion pictures have been invited to co-operate. The committee desires to learn of high grade films treating of health, play, children, prisons, summer babies, child labor, flies, and other subjects interesting to public officials and social workers. Correpondence may addressed to E. C. Routzahn, Southern Sociological Congress, Nashville. Express packages can be addressed the same way.

BOOKED THE "MAN BEHIND THE VOICE."

A correspondent writing from Peoria, Ill., wishes the World to say that the management of the Sagamon Theater of that city has booked the services of Mr. A. F. Ratelle, known throughout the West as the "man behind the voice," and that they consider themselves fortunate in securing the services of one so talented as he.

JOE CANTES BUILDING NEW THEATER.

Joe Cantes, who has operated the Star and Luna Picture Theaters at Atlantic City, N. J., for the past three years, has sold those houses and is now building a new theater for pictures at Pleasantville, N. J., to be called the Sun Theater. The house will have a seating capacity of 1,000; five and ten cents admission will be charged. Mr. Cantes hopes to have the house ready for the opening on Memorial Day.

Carnegie Museum Expedition of 1911.

Unexampled Motion Views of Siberian and Alaskan Life, Photographed by Capt. F. E. Kleinschmitt.

With feature pictures crowding one upon the heels of another, we are put to sore straits this week for descriptive English to meet the occasion. Just as we had exhausted our supply of adjectives upon other big subjects, along came Captain Kleinschmitt of the Carnegie Museum, Pittsburgh, exploring expedition, with an invitation to run over to the Hotel Astor and see what he had been doing up in the North Pole district during the past year. Notwithstanding that the writer had seen more reels during the past week than in any week of his life, the invitation was eagerly accepted, on account of the novelty of the subject.

There was his room, littered with hundreds of photographs taken by the Captain in the Land of the Midnight Sun, three of the pictures being shown with this article. In all there were ten reels of the polar pictures, which will be culled down to six when the pictures are put out on state rights.

Captain Kleinschmitt has overlooked nothing of interest in his valuable record. He shows us intimate views of Eskimo life such as the great majority of us have never been privileged to witness. We learn from his pictures the great value of the dog in northern life. We become better acquainted with the reindeer than we ever expected to be. Albatross by the million, literally speaking, are frequently seen, and one wonders how in that frozen region there can be a morsel of food for them to eat. Schools of sea lion are to be seen sunning themselves upon huge cakes of ice. When the hunters approach, there is an avalanche of sea lions into the water. The walrus is a creature whose habits are a mystery. His habits are similar to those of the sea-lion, but his great tusks give him more power. They enable him to climb upon high crags of ice and to do other things of like nature. In one of the scenes a walrus easily drags a half-dozen men at the end of a rope as though they were kittens. This he does by putting his tusks in the ice like a pair of hooks. Everything comes with him.

But the polar bear is king in those regions. White coated to agree with his surroundings, he is protected as all animals are by mother nature by being matched to the color of the ground they inhabit. A polar bear needs only to remain still and he is completely hidden, although he be in the open and only a few yards away. He is a dreadful creature to face, but we don't mind facing him in moving pictures. In fact, we are very brave, and follow him many miles in a boat, watching him swim in the cold clear water. When he comes to an ice floe he dives deep beneath it and comes up on the other side, but all the time we keep sight of him, because the water is so clear that his course under water can be distinctly photographed. This is perhaps the first instance on record of animated photography under water from above; due, of course, to its great clearness.

This photographing of animals in their native haunts for moving pictures is a wonderful thing. A polar bear looks much better on a floating ice cake than he does in a cage. Often in these pictures he looks like a fine white marble statue on a beautiful alabaster pedestal. We realize then as never before why God made him white.

For a summer show these pictures will be hard to beat. Stepping in off Broadway on the hottest day in summer to look at them, the manager can surely guarantee that a patron will feel many degrees cooler. The scenes breathe a coldness that actually penetrates. With so much ice in sight, the pictures offer an excellent opportunity for mental scientists to demonstrate on a hot day the power of auto-suggestion.

Eskimo Village Scene from Carnegie Expedition Pictures.

"THE PUNISHMENT" (Biograph).

"The Punishment," a new picture released on April 4th, is a fascinating film of strength and beauty, which I do not hesitate to recommend. Brilliant photography marks the film throughout; note especially the soft lights cast upon the faces of the actors to bring out the slightest detail of facial expression. This feat was very cleverly and effectively accomplished. The play itself is well worked out. The setting is European and contrasts the landowner with the poor peasant. The peasant has a pretty daughter who is in love with a farmhand called Lucian. One day while working in the field the girl is insulted by the landowner's son, who, in turn, is repaid with a blow from Lucian. The peasant family feel that this incident may be their ruin, for the landowner's son has much influence over his aged father. And so it happens the son reports the episode to his father, who, enraged, visits the peasant's hut seeking vengeance. The girl, however, was so pretty that the landowner lost his rage, said nothing and left deeply impressed. It is not long before the landowner sends a letter proposing marriage between the girl and his son. The girl loves Lucian and at first rejects the proposal; the poor parents are now sure of their ruin and plan suicide by setting fire to their hut, but they are saved by Lucian and their daughter, who was so deeply moved by her parents' act that she consents to marry the landowner's son.

One next sees the girl dressed in sweeping silken gowns and mistress of a marble mansion; she visits her humble parents and on parting is given a rosary. On the way home she meets Lucian, but does not stop to talk very long. Lucian finds her rosary and follows her; her husband seeing them from a distance plans to surprise them. He snatches a sword from the wall and hides in a chest in his wife's room. As Lucian enters the room he is seen by the landowner and, although his motive is simply to return the rosary, both he and the girl are suspected. Lucian, hearing the old man's footsteps, leaves by the window. The landowner, suspecting Lucian of hiding in the chest, locks the lid and gives the lovers one hour to live. The girl, thinking that Lucian is really in the chest, tries to open it, while the enraged landowner, with dagger in his hand, waits in the hall for the hour to pass. The note that the girl drops from the window falls into the hands of Lucian, who appears just as the landowner is about to slay his daughter-in-law. The old man then opens the chest and finds his son dead. The shock of this punishment is too great for the aged landowner and a stroke ends his life. This leaves the estate to the girl.

The acting in this picture is well done and the marble mansion one of the most beautiful ever shown. It will be observed that the interior scenes of this house do not match the splendor of its exterior. The narrow staircase and hall shown in the picture surely cannot belong to the house whose entrance rivals that of the Capitol at Washington. The film is well constructed and holds the interest to such an extent that one is sorry when it is over. It has, as yet, not failed to bring applause from the audience; which is, after all, the vital test.

A first class motion picture theater in Hasbrouck Heights, N. J., is an assured fact. A plot of ground on the corner of the Boulevard and Division Avenue on the site of the old Field Club ball grounds, has been purchased for that purpose.

Mr. John D. Denton, of Franklin Avenue, below Terrace, is responsible for the venture. Mr. Denton is a man of wide experience and has had a great deal to do with motion pictures. The building will be a cozy one with a seating capacity of about 250 and arranged so that the building can be easily enlarged when necessary.

FEATURE PHOTOPLAY COMPANY IN STRONG.

Mr. H. Lande and Mr. P. Adler, composing the Feature Photoplay Company, have got into the feature film business good and strong. Notable among the features now being handled by that firm for select Eastern territory are the Eclair subjects "Zigomar," "The Redemption" and "The Glass Coffin." For the last two subjects this company has secured the rights for New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, Rhode Island and Eastern Pennsylvania. For "Zigomar" it will cover the same territory, with the exception of Pennsylvania. Several other good features are under consideration by the Feature Photoplay Company. The officers of the company are at 145 West 45th Street, New York City.

SOLAX "BILLY" COMEDIES IN DEMAND.

The Solax Company reports that it is getting many letters of appreciation on account of its "Billy" series of comedies and spectacular melodramas, and that many exhibitors are featuring Solax releases on regular "Solax Nights." One of these, Mr. H. Krohn, of Easton, Pa., sends in a photograph of his theater, billed for a "Solax" night, and a few lines regarding the result of the plan. This is what he writes:

"'Solax Night,' last night (March 27), was one big success and certainly made the people wake up to the merits of Independent films, especially the Solax. Your film 'Billy's Grip,' was certainly a roar from start to finish, and it certainly scored a hit for 'Billy.' Mr. Quirk was behind the screen on the stage when it was first run, and he let loose with 'I believe that's a good picture.' I agreed with him. Right after the finish of this film, 'Billy' entertained the audience with a few songs and some sound philosophy

NEW BORDER DESIGNS FOR THREE-SHEET BOARDS.

The Exhibitors' Advertising & Specialty Co., Arthur D. Jacobs, president and general manager, of 30 Union Square, New York City, have added a new design to their series of Poster Frames or Border Designs. These now come in ten (10) different designs, wordings and color schemes and add tone and distinction to the lobby of any moving picture theater when used in combination with the standard one-sheet posters.

Each poster frame or border design consists of four different sheets of paper handsomely lithographed in colors which when pasted on a three-sheet board leave a blank space (28x42) in the centre just large enough for a one-sheet poster to be pasted or tacked on.

The top sheet is a full one-sheet size (in ten different designs and color combinations) and read variously as follows: 1—To-Days Newest Feature; 2—To-Day's Added Attraction; 3—Special To-Day; 4—Showing To-Day; 5—Now Playing; 6—Special Feature; 7—Extra Feature; 8—Special Attraction; 9—Extra Attraction; 10—Coming Soon. Considering the price (the complete set of ten sells for $1.00, 20c extra for prepaid postage) exhibitors (whether Licensed, Independent or National) could make no mistake by ordering a trial set of ten.

CRYSTAL FILM COMPANY GETTING BUSY.

The Crystal Film Company, whose magnificent studio and factory was described in the recent issue of the Moving Picture World, are doing some interesting work in special moving picture film for educational and advertising purposes.

This firm is undertaking the making of the series of pictures for the Pennsylvania Railroad Company that is really an innovation, as this undertaking opens up a new field in motion photography. Mr. Erb and Mr. Golden, of the Crystal Co., have worked out an arrangement of tests to determine the effects on the ties and tracks of railroads while heavily laden freight and passenger trains are passing around curves; also to determine the exact amount of the shifting of the centers of gravity of engines and cars while in motion around such curves.

This company has received a number of requests for information as to possible uses of moving pictures, and they are co-operating enthusiastically with scientists, manufacturers and educational institutions, with a view to developing many of the possible new fields of photography.

The Crystal Film Company have secured Mr. John Urie, formerly with the Biograph and Edison companies, who is in charge of the photographic department. Mr. Paul Hedrich, who has made and developed hundreds of splendid negatives for the New York Zoological Society, is in charge of the laboratory. Mr. Harry Zeller, who needs no introduction to the trade, is the expert mechanician in charge of the printing and perforating equipment.

With these men directing their several important departments, the Crystal Film Company have every reason to feel satisfied that they can handle their own regular and special productions and in addition thereto do a larger quantity of work that they are being asked to handle for other manufacturers whose orders exceed the capacities of their plants.

The splendid studio of this company has been recently improved by additions to its artificial lighting plant, which make it one of the very best equipped lighting outfits in the country. The Crystal Film Company welcome inspection of their plant by the trade and all others who are interested in motion picture photography.

"BROTHERS" (Champion).

These boys in their early career will interest the playgoer by the peculiar conditions which surround their young lives; but in a lapse of thirty years, which is shown on the film, the characters themselves hold a gripping interest for all. One is a priest, the other a burglar. The development of the story as these two weave in and out of it is fascinating in the extreme. An unexpected situation is evolved when one of the brothers (the burglar) takes refuge in the Church and is protected by the other, though unaware of his true identity. It is a strikingly dramatic situation. Later the mutual recognition of the brothers which comes about through a portrait of their mother is a pathetic incident, which pulls on the heart strings, but its finale is one of the sweetest of endings.

Apart from the story, there attaches to the film a peculiar charm in its characters, or rather the personnel of the company in the presentation. Mr. Frank B. Coine plays the part of one of the priest brothers, and, oddly enough, he was himself at first intended for the ministry. Mr. Hoskins, who is renowned for his knowledge of the art of make-up, plays the part of the brother who is a burglar. Miss Francis and Miss Orlamond play the principal feminine roles with their usual ease of manner.

CHANGE OF PENNSYLVANIA CONVENTION.

Pittsburgh, April 2, 1912.

To The Motion Picture Exhibitors of Pennsylvania.

Gentlemen: We are sorry to inform you that it is impossible for us to hold our State Convention at Harrisburg, as we can get no one in that city to make the necessary arrangements to assure the success that such a gathering of business men demands.

And as many of the manufacturing and business enterprises of our city promised to aid us financially and otherwise to entertain the exhibitors and their friends who would attend the convention, we thought it best to call the convention to meet in Pittsburgh, on Monday and Tuesday, June 24th and 25th, 1912.

Now we ask the exhibitors of Pennsylvania and other states to join with us in making this convention the grand success it should and will be. It is not necessary that you should be a member of our league to come to the convention, as we would be glad to have you with us, as we know we need you and you need us, so come to Pittsburgh and aid in making the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League the one big organization of motion picture exhibitors.

Make arrangements to come to our city, we guarantee to all who attend a good and lively time, as the boys in the Smoky City are on the job as entertainers and people who do things; we also wish to let you know that Pittsburgh promotes progress, so make up your mind to be with us at our state convention on June 24th and 25th, 1912. Now let us hear from you. We remain yours for organization,

MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE, OF PENNSYLVANIA.
233 Fifth Avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa.

COBB JOINS RELIANCE.

Mr. C. Lang Cobb, Jr., well known in the moving picture trade for some years past, is now a member of the Reliance staff. Mr. Cobb will be one of the traveling representatives of the Reliance brand of film. To accept this engagement, Mr. Cobb resigned as general manager of the Consolidated Motion Picture Supplies Co., 97 Water Street, New York. Mr. Cobb was recently married to Miss Agnes Egan, who is also well known and popular in the trade. Mrs. Cobb will succeed her husband in the position just vacated by him.

ANOTHER SUIT AGAINST SALES COMPANY.

The Majestic Film Company has commenced another action against the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company. This time it is the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. The summonses were served on the officers and directors of the Sales Company on April 4th.

'TWILL GET THE WOMEN.

New Rochelle became a fashion center the other day when real models posed all the 1912 spring and summer creations of Worth, Paquin, Louise and Redfern for the Thanhouser cameras. And it was merely in connection with a dramatic story called "The Saleslady" in which the creations are as but a detail, although they get featuring. They are sure to "draw" the ladies, at least.

THANHOUSER EMPLOYEES' BALL.

The annual ball of the employees of the Thanhouser Company will be held at New Rochelle, N. Y., on Monday evening, April 15. Tickets are 50c each and a large and happy time is promised to all who attend.

Scenes from "The Fate of Mothers," by the Gaumont Company.

A mother-in-law picture this, without the usual time-worn comedy appertaining thereto. It is a story where mother has naught but the best intentions, though they are not appreciated until nearly too late.

"Josephine."

Gorgeous Cines Picture Story of the Dramatic Life of the Famous Empress of the French.

GEORGE KLEINE will release on May 11th a gorgeous Cines production, entitled "Josephine." The dramatic story of the famous empress offers a subject of unusual worth, and it can be assured that the manufacturers have spared no care or expense in rendering the film an epoch-maker among one-reel productions.

The opening scenes show Josephine in her native home in Martinique, with all its romantic surroundings. She, imbued with the superstitions of the peasantry, visits an old soothsayer, who foretells a brilliant destiny, prophesying that she will become a queen.

Soon afterwards, Josephine meets the Viscount de Beauharnais, who falls in love with her, and ultimately proposes marriage, the result of the happy union being two children. Troublesome times fall upon France, and Beauharnais, his wife, and children, are cast into prison by the revolutionists. They are condemned to death, and the death death penalty is carried out in the case of Beauharnais, but Josephine and her children are liberated. While in prison, Josephine has a vivid dream of her husband's death by the guillotine; a dream that proves true in every particular.

Josephine and Bonaparte first meet at the home of Barras, a man of prominence at that time, and it is a case of mutual love at first sight. After a short while their nuptials are celebrated; the magnificent religious marriage rites being performed with great pomp and ceremony. Napoleon and Josephine live happily together until Metternich, the Austrian minister, proposes that Napoleon, in order to strengthen his position with Austria, divorce Josephine, the empress, who had borne him no heir, and marry Princess Marie Louise. The idea is entertained by the emperor, and, after a striking scene, Josephine, although heartbroken, consents. Events then move rapidly, the divorce takes place, and Napoleon marries the Austrian princess.

We last see the emperor and empress presenting the newborn heir to the rejoicing people, and the contrasting grief of unhappy Josephine when she hears the tidings.

Scene from "Josephine" (Cines).

All of the scenes are presented in the most elaborate manner. The celebrated religious ceremony of their marriage, on the eve of the coronation day, is extremely well executed; the prelates of the church in their gorgeous costumes, Napoleon and Josephine as they march in, surrounded by a glittering array of officers and well-dressed ladies of the court, are very interesting indeed.

One could not consider this film without mentioning, in particular, the admirable way in which the characters of Napoleon and Josephine are given. The scenes, in which Napoleon informs Josephine of his intention to divorce her, show some remarkable acting, and give one a clear insight into the lives of those two great figures in history.

"Out of the Night."

An Absorbing Story Pictured by the Essaney Eastern Company Highly Commended.

Reviewed by Jas. S. McQuade.

"OUT OF THE NIGHT" is the title of a very absorbing story done in moving pictures by one of Essanay's Eastern companies. It is of full-reel length, but one becomes so engrossed in the film that the end comes all too soon. I have no fear in predicting a big hit for this film, for it will touch many a heart by its realism and by the similitude of its story to the happenings of one's own life. It preaches a powerful sermon on the brotherhood of man, and will beget in many hearts a sympathy for the poor wrecks who have gone down before the shocks of life's battle and become homeless wanderers.

Two men are the only actors in this photodrama, yet the spectator is held in thrall by these two—one of them a tramp, the other a man of broken fortunes. The weaker and meaner saves the stronger from a shameful death, and is instrumental in restoring him to his right mind and to confidence in himself.

Howard Moore, a young broker, is discovered in the well-appointed library of his handsome home. A crash in banking circles has carried away his fortune, and his fiancée breaks her engagement. The last misfortune unmans him and he seeks courage in liquor to end his life with a revolver. Outside, in the bitter night, Joe Brown, the tramp, stands shivering. He looks into the comfortable room through the window, and gazes longingly at the decanter of liquor. Moore, glancing toward the window and catching sight of the face, steps over to draw the curtains. The tramp holds out his hands appealingly and Moore, actuated by some strong impulse, opens the French window and admits him. Then seeing his pitiable condition he offers the tramp a drink and asks him to be seated.

Brown, catching sight of the revolver, asks the broker if he intended killing himself. Learning the truth, he inquires the reason. Then Moore points to the newspaper account of the loss of his fortune and next to the note from his fiancée. The tramp reads both and, looking keenly at the young broker, requests him to listen to a story that he has to tell.

The story is told by dissolving views on the wall of the library. These views show a young man, strong, confident and resolute, who also loved a beautiful girl. We see him in his office elated with success, as the ticker shows a great advance in securities held by him. Then we watch him as he purchases expensive flowers for the girl he loves and discover him later paying an evening call. She receives him with happy smiles and gestures of endearment.

But one day we see this young man enter his office hastily and rush to the ticker. His face grows ghastly as he reads. Then he staggers into a chair. He is ruined. He calls on the woman he loves for comfort, but she receives him coldly and returns her engagement ring. And now began the downward course. He becomes a slave of drink. He had thought of ending it all by a pistol shot, but changes his mind. The prosperous, happy young broker of the past has developed into the tramp, Joe Brown.

As Howard Moore listens to the story he determines to become a man and face his changed fortunes with fortitude. He spills the liquor out of the decanter and, seizing the revolver, unloads the cartridges. Then he offers the few bills in his possession to the poor tramp, who refuses them. The latter finally accepts one for the purpose, as we can see, of getting something more to drink. Then he goes back into the night.

Excellent photography marks the film throughout. The release date has been set for Friday, May 10th.

ESSANAY BASEBALL CLUB.

Among the many Spring activities at the Chicago studio of the Essanay Company is the organization of a baseball club among the members of the stock company. A wealth of natural talent has already been discovered and, as soon as the nine is perfected, challenges are to be hurled at various local organizations for a series of games. This looks like the real sporting spirit, and, with the opening of the baseball season, Essanay is bound to be right in line for the championship.

"Redemption."

A Three-Reel Feature Subject by the French Eclair Company —Reviewed During the Week in New York City.

THOUGH purely dramatic in its theme and treatment, "Redemption," like all good pictures, aims to teach a moral, which is plainly meant to be the forgiveness of sins. The central figure of the story is a modern Magdelene, Nana Aumont. It is a story that unfolds, with truth and clearness, the many pitfalls that await the unsophisticated maiden in the heart of a great city like Paris. In the moral code of the roue, there are apparently no such words as pity, equity, honor or fair play. The weaker the woman the more quickly she comes to the shambles. Particularly, is all this true of girls who are struggling alone to earn an honest livelihood. Working girls fall into snares of treachery laid by wealthy clubmen like lambs led into a slaughter pen with the babble of innocence still in their mouths. A man to slaughter lambs must have a hardened heart, but not so hard a one as he who makes a wretched sinner of a happy girl.

The Arrest of Nana (Scenes from "Redemption").

The Raid on the Concert Hall.

Nana Aumont was an ordinary working girl, like thousands of others. She was not poverty stricken, nor one whose every wish was fulfilled, but simply an ordinary girl who lived with her father and little sister. Their combined earnings furnished them a respectable existence, so long as they were left alone. The girl was a dressmaker and called frequently at the homes of wealthy women, to fit upon fair forms lovely gowns, which she herself, in her humble station, could never hope to wear. Such things have a deep seated effect upon any girl. The love of good things to wear is inherent in the female heart and is not unworthy. Most girls bear up well under ordinary circumstances, until it is pointed out to them by masculine suavity that these things are all within easy grasp, if she will but say the word. That is an old, old story, but, old as it is, it is always dreadfully new to those who are unfortunately involved as characters therein.

Nana delivered a dress one day at a mansion and made several calls afterwards, until the fitting was completed. She was treated nicely there, but more particularly by gentlemen, who might rather be expected to be at work during the day than dallying at afternoon teas. The work of such men is usually clever and complete. The tired eye, the sympathetic word, the cheering glass and a drug, are four great factors in every tale like this. To a young woman just embarking on this sort of a voyage, all former forebodings on the subject become silly and absurd, in the utter tranquility of the new life. The new life lasts to a greater or less degree, according to the disposition of the victim. An ill-tempered girl will not last as long in this new environment as one who retains her sweetness. Nana did not linger long with the Count who launched her on her merry course. Life was too gay with her to be serious about anything. She had left her father's humble home some time before and was ostensibly making a living as lady's companion in a wealthy family. But her little sister delivering a dress at the mansion one day discovered that Nana was the life of the party and the child conveyed the news to their father. That night the old man made his unbidden appearance at a fancy dress ball at the Count's residence and found his daughter reigning as a queen among Bohemian revelers. The girl was, of course, dumbfounded, but dissipation had blunted her sense of honor. Noticing this the old man raised his cane to strike her, but in that moment apoplexy did its work, and from that time Nana was her own guardian.

A bridge had been crossed; it put back into the past forevermore her girlhood, and her womanhood began. No father now to tell her right from wrong; no father's reproaches to fear, therefore nothing really mattered much as long as things came easily. By this time, of course, she was a fairly good dancer and was a vaudeville artist of some moderate renown. It was Nana who tired of the Count before he had a chance to tire of her. She took up with a handsome concert hall singer, but he tossed her aside, after a short time, like a toy. This was her first rebuff. It galled her to realize that what to her was a tragedy was to other women a joke, for they laughed at her, and she began to see, perhaps for the first time, just how far she had really drifted. She had gone too far to get back to shore again without help. Repulses dull the edge of ambition nearly always. With her ebbing popularity, Nana found that ambition was ebbing also.

In a perfunctory way she took up with an old adventurer who drugged her and robbed her of whatever she possessed of value. Her steps downward from this point were hard bumps. Against her will, but strictly according to the law of human nature, she found herself among the frequenters of dives, such a course being preferable to starvation. Though higher in mind than her new-found companions, she was forced to join in their boorish bickerings, whether she would or not.

Finally one night she was arrested in a raid upon a dance hall and hailed before the magistrate, with a number of callous women, to whom jail was a familiar place of abode. Their appearance in court was one of bravado; a foolhardy contempt for the law, knowing its limitations. But to Nana it was a terrible thing. She sank to her knees, crushed and humiliated, but perhaps the magistrate thought she was beyond redemption, for he did not show her any mercy, nor treat her differently in any way from the most hardened case before him. Thus with these nefarious creatures she was thrown into a prison for females. Her companions scoffed at her for taking matters so seriously, and, goaded into a frenzy, she flew at them like an angered tigress. In her insane rage she slapped the face of the Sister who came to speak with her. Following the biblical proverb the good Sister turned the other cheek. Nana realized the situation and knelt humbly at her feet in sorrow. Her remorse was great. Her proud spirit by this episode was crushed forever and she stood penitent for always.

A physical and mental breakdown was due in the case of Nana, and it came with great violence. She tossed between life and death in the prison hospital, attended by the Sister whom she had struck in her wrath. This sickness of Nana is a very impressive part of the picture, for, in her ravings, there appear visions of her past. She sees herself once more—a girl—and as the young dressmaker; still innocent of the world and its wrongs. She sees her good father and her little sister. The evil face of the Count appears to smile his mocking smile at her. And so on, in procession, like the ghosts of Macbeth, these visions come to haunt her. These apparitions are done by double exposure in a highly artistic and impressive way.

There comes a chance at last for redemption. The great opportunity, that every sinner craves, to redeem the transgressions of the past. A pestilence breaks out in the city. The good and the bad alike are stricken on all sides. There is a call for volunteer attendants for those who are suffering with the plague. It amounts to a call for heroes, to nurse the sick in case of a pestilence like this, and it is at this crucial moment that Nana arises to the occasion and declares it to be her work to nurse a stricken wretch back to health. This she did with unfaltering bravery and thereafter nursed others, with prayers for salvation always upon her lips. Finally, the Sister Superior herself is stricken and Nana, although exhausted, will allow no one to attend the good woman but herself. At last, her vitality brought to a low ebb by overwork, Nana falls a victim to the plague herself. Meanwhile the authorities have heard of her heroic work and she has been voted a medal of the Legion of Honor. A committee arrives at the hospital to decorate her with this much prized emblem, but the decoration arrives in time to serve only as a token of esteem to the dead. Nana went to her grave as a Christian soldier with the marks of respect that France bestows upon her heroes and her heroines.

The picture is strong in acting and in characterization. It is a feature picture, absolutely. It is done in the best Eclair fashion which means competency in all departments. There is no risk in billing this picture to any extent. The Moving Picture World can recommend it as a box office attraction.

New Censorship Proposed.

Drastic Ordinance for New York City Before Board of Aldermen.

Alderman Courtlandt Nicoll introduced at the last meeting of the New York Board of Aldermen a proposed ordinance virtually establishing a censor of moving pictures in the five boroughs of Greater New York.

The draft of the proposed ordinance was not discussed by the City Fathers, the only action taken was to refer it to the Committee on Laws and Legislation.

If this ordinance meets with approval it will have a drastic effect upon the moving picture business of New York, as it is proposed to have all films censored by James G. Wallace, chief of the Mayor's Bureau of Licenses, before they are exhibited in public. If Wallace approves the films he will issue a permit and this permit must be publicly shown at the entrance to any moving picture place where films are on exhibition.

Section 3 provides that if any film tends to injure the morals of youths or others, permission will be refused to exhibit the film. The ordinance practically names Mr. Wallace as the chief censor. Appeals from his decision are to be made to the Mayor and a writ of certiorari is to be the last resort in case the Mayor upholds the views of the Chief of the Bureau of Licenses.

There are other provisions for the transfer of the permit from the manufacturer to the exhibitors and by transfer from the latter to others, but in all the transfers such facts must be made known to the Bureau of Licenses. It will be seen from this summary that the ordinance, if passed, will have a revotionary effect upon the moving picture industry in New York.

The ordinance is of such far reaching importance that we print the full text of its provisions. It is as follows:

Motion Picture Censorship Ordinance.

Be it Ordained by the Board of Aldermen of The City of New York, as follows:

1. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation to show or exhibit in any motion picture theater or in any open air motion picture theater any motion picture without having first obtained a permit therefor issued by the Bureau of Licenses, as hereinafter provided. Every day's exhibition in any motion picture theater or in any open air picture theater of any motion picture, without such permit therefor, shall be deemed a distinct and separate violation of this ordinance.

2. Before any such permit is issued an application in writing shall be made therefor, and the plates, films, rolls or other like apparatus, by or from which such motion picture is shown or produced, or the motion picture itself as shown or exhibited shall be shown to the Bureau of Licenses, which shall inspect or cause to be inspected such plates, films, rolls or apparatus of such motion picture; and within three days after such inspection the Bureau of Licenses shall either issue or deny the permit therefor. In case such permit is granted it shall be issued in writing and in such form as the Bureau of Licenses shall prescribe.

3. If any motion picture, for the exhibition of which an application for such permit is made, is an obscene, indecent, immoral or impure motion picture, which would tend to the corruption of the morals of youth or others, it shall be the duty of the Bureau of Licenses to refuse such permit, otherwise it shall be the duty of the Bureau of Licenses to grant such permit.

4. In case the Bureau of Licenses shall refuse to issue such permit, the applicant therefore may appeal to the Mayor. Such appeal shall be presented to the Mayor in the same manner as the original application to the Bureau of Licenses. If any motion picture for the exhibition of which such appeal is made to the Mayor for a permit is an obscene, indecent, immoral or impure motion picture, which would tend to the corruption of the morals of youth, or others, it shall be the duty of the Mayor to refuse such permit, otherwise it shall be the duty of the Mayor to grant and issue such permit. The determination of the Mayor in respect to the appeal for any such permit may be reviewed by writ of certiorari; and the provisions of law and of practice in respect to the writ or certiorari to review the determination of an inferior tribunal shall be applicable thereto.

5. The permit provided for in this ordinance shall be obtained for each and every motion picture exhibited in any motion picture theater or in any open air motion picture theater, and shall be required in addition to any license now required by any law or ordinance or required by any other provision of this ordinance. No fee or tax of any kind whatsoever shall be charged or exacted for such permit.

6. When such permit to show or exhibit a motion picture is once issued to any applicant, such motion picture may be shown in any motion picture theater or in any open air motion picture theater, provided that such written permit therefor is actually delivered to the licensee of such motion picture theater or open air motion picture theater; and that a written notice of such transfer of such permit to such licensee is first duly mailed by such transferee to the Bureau of Licenses. Any number of transfers of such permit may be thus made, provided always that such permit is actually delivered to such transferee, and that such written notice be first mailed to the Bureau of Licenses. Such written notice shall contain the number of such permit, the name and a brief description of the motion picture permitted thereby and the location of the motion picture theater or open air motion picture theater where such transferee proposes to show or exhibit such motion picture. The exhibition in any motion picture theater or in any open air motion picture theater by any transferee of such permit of the motion picture permitted thereby, without first mailing such notice to the Bureau of Liceses, shall be considered a violation of this ordinance; and each day's exhibition in any motion picture theater or in any open air motion picture theater, by any transferee of such permit of the motion picture permitted thereby without first mailing such notice to the Bureau of Licenses, shall be deemed a distinct and separate offense.

7. The permit provided for in this ordinance shall be posted at or near the entrance of the motion picture theater or the open air motion picture theater, where the motion picture permitted by such permit is being shown or exhibited, at such a place and in such a position that such permit can easily be read by any person entering such theater at any time when such motion picture is there being exhibited. The exhibition of any motion picture in any motion picture theater or in any open air motion picture theater without the posting of such permit therefor shall be considered a violation of this ordinance; and each day's exhibition of any motion picture in any motion picture theater or open air motion picture theater, without the posting of such permit therefor shall be deemed a distinct and separate offense.

8. Anyone violating the provisions of this ordinance shall be fined for each offense not less than $50 nor more than $100.

9. All ordinances or parts of ordinances inconsistent with this ordinance are hereby repealed. Nothing in this ordinance shall be considered to abridge or modify the power of the Mayor to suspend or revoke any license or permit granted or issued under the provisions of any other law or ordinance.

Rex Theater Opens.

The New House at Salt Lake City, Which Swanson Built, Is Now Doing Business.

Invitations have been received by The Moving Picture World for the opening of Wm. H. Swanson's new Rex Theater at Salt Lake City, Utah, which occurred on Saturday, April 6. The invitations are very classy in character and unique in wording, being done in gold and royal purple on fancy paper. Liberal notices of the event were printed in the Salt Lake papers and there was a splendid turnout on the opening night.

The Rex Theater is considered one of the most beautiful and attractive theaters in the United States. The entire length from the front to the back wall is 235 feet. The lobby is 12 feet deep, beautifully decorated in the Grecian style, with massive brass doors entering into the foyer, which is 30 by 30 feet, and beautifully decorated in subdued old French and Grecian style. The auditorium is 50 by 165 feet, with a seating capacity of over 1,600 on one floor.

The theater has probably one of the best lighting effects to be found in any theater in the country. There are over 1,500 electric lights in the auditorium for full lighting display, augmented by complete indirect lighting system. The construction of the floor is of unusual interest, in that it is the largest of its kind in the West and it is its graceful curves which make it possible to afford a seating capacity of 1,600 at the same time insuring a free and unobstructive view of the stage, at all angles and at all times. The stage is complete in every detail, and is thoroughly safeguarded from possible fire.

Another unusual feature connected with the Rex Theater is the women's retiring room, which will be in charge of a competent maid and equipped with nursery beds for babies, free telephone service, and similar conveniences and accommodations.

Then the organ: It is a Kimball pipe organ, cost $20,000 to construct, required ten men in its erection and at least ten days to complete.

From the foregoing one needn't be a prophet to predict a great history for the Rex. People who respect their own comfort and appreciate what others do to obtain it, will flock to the Rex Theater, and as birds of a feather flock together, there'll be quite a little crowd. The pictures themselves should be mighty proud to have a home such as this, and it is particularly flattering to the Independent program that the theater is to be a first run Independent house. The entire cost of the Rex Theater is $150,000.

AMERICAN PRODUCES MYSTIC SUBJECT.

On Thursday, May 9, the American Film Mfg. Co. will release one of the oddest subjects it has ever issued. The title of this picture is "The Myth of Jamasha Pass." It contains some remarkably beautiful photography—some of the finest, without question, that has ever been put out anywhere. The tale itself is mystical and the general trend of the story is explained by the first subtitle, which reads: "In the gloomy depths of the Sierras, superstitious old men were wont to tell of the mystical maid who lived in the Pass of Jamasha. This mystical maid, so the story goes, "Oft appeared at sundown seeking the souls of men." The story is allegorical, the sub-titles poetical and calculated to throw an air of the mystic around the subject.

Miss Von Trump, that clever ingenué who has been making good in American pictures for the past four months, plays the leading role, which is difficult of interpretation and calls for a high grade of histrionic talent. She appears in tattered garments on the mountain top, smiling and waving her arms in an awe-inspiring fashion, disappears into solid rock and reappears in bewildering fashion. It is expected that "The Myth of Jamasha Pass" will make a decided sensation. It is decidedly new and handled in an entirely novel way.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT.

Princess Wants to Know.

Writing from the Princess Theater, Marianna, Ark., G. F. Gambrell writes:

> We are sending you under separate cover photograph of our theater; also am inclosing two of our programs which were used on different nights. We would be pleased to have your comment on this class of advertising. As you will see the two programs were printed by two different printers, and would like to have your opinion as to which size you consider the most likely to have the best effect. Of course the Cinderella is a feature, but the small program was the best business getter; possibly the subject was commented on a little stronger than Cinderella in the announcement. As you will see, we are using Licensed service thirty to forty-five days; a change every day of three reels. Our house seats 250 and is very modernly equipped for a small town.

The larger program is 5 x 7½ inches and the smaller 4 x 6, both on white paper. The larger program is better displayed on the cover and the smooth finish paper gives a better and cleaner looking job while a better grade of ink is used, but there is more pull to any one of the inside pages of the smaller sheet than to the whole of the Cinderella announcement. A shocking amount of space is wasted in giving the cast of the Selig production on each of the three pages. As the cast is precisely the same, this should have been given once, the synopses of the three reels on the second page and the back cover reserved for booming in the fashion this feature release deserves.

Pick Out the Points.

Here is a release that appeals particularly to the children. In many places it has been brought back one or more times just as a matinee attraction, with a change of bill for the night show, and where this has been done the results have been big business, and yet in a four-page folder an entire page is wasted on a repetition of the cast and the only line for the children is the single statement that there is a children's matinee from 2 to 5 o'clock.

The title alone should suggest the advantage of making special appeal to the children and prior to the release of the film THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD contained much valuable matter that could have been added to the press material sent out by the Selig Company. In place of this there is the cold type announcement that it is "a spectacular dramatic adaptation of the well known fairly tale, featuring Picturedom's greatest star, Miss Mabel Taliaferro." That is one of the company's lines and it is every blessed bit of booming that is given the release in a four-page folder entirely devoted to this single subject.

The Princess folder is but the type of hundreds of circulars that do not bring back the printing costs because the points are not brought out.

Boom to Beat the Band.

When you get a subject read up on it—and "you" does not mean the Princess, but all managements—get all the facts; if there are not enough invent a few yourself, but as a rule there are plenty to be had in this paper and the press matter of the maker.

From this array of facts select those points that will most effectually appeal to your townsmen and particularly those who are your patrons or who can be made patrons. Word these facts as attractively as possible and put enthusiasm into every word you write. Get enthusiastic about it yourself and communicate your enthusiasm to your readers.

In this particular instance there should have been something to tell who Miss Taliaferro is. Don't take it for granted that because you know the stars your readers must. If she has played your town tell the plays she was seen in; if a picture player mention some of the film successes you've run.

Tell how every setting was specially built in the spacious Selig studio and how whole streets of a mythical city were reared in the studio yard. Give figures as to the cost of production. Point out that you are offering a hundred thousand dollar production for ten cents; a big scenic spectacle with the pick of the Selig favorite players and a special dramatic star known the country over. Make such a fuss over it that you'll want to go and see it yourself and you've got others fired with the same desire.

Balance Your Lines.

The smaller circular pulls up the points better, but there seems to be a lack of proportion here. With "Lost in the Jungle," for example, the text reads:

> LOST IN THE JUNGLE.
> The Most Thrilling and Phenomenal Wild Animal Picture Ever Produced.
> Showing a Girl Lost in the Great South African Jungle.
> Infested with Wild Animals. Showing how a Monstrous ELEPHANT saves her from the jaws of Death.
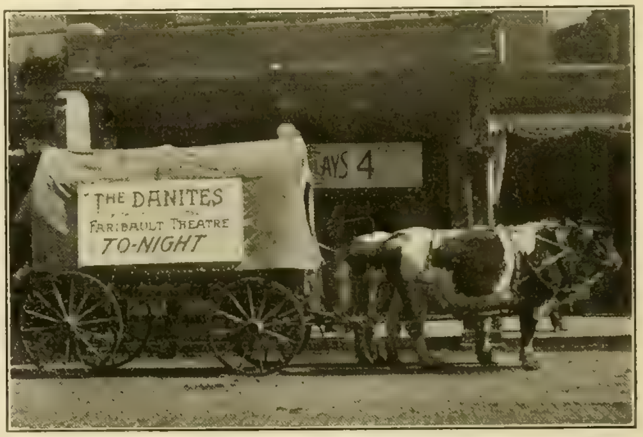
> Don't Fail to See This!

Here the fact that the girl is rescued by an elephant is more important than the fact she is lost in the jungle, which has already been explained by the title, yet the third paragraph is given larger display than the fourth, and the second sinks into the smaller type as well. Pick out the big points for the big type and if you have not sufficient space, cut out some of the small type. The advertisement is used to boom the feature, and the more emphatic the display the better the advertising.

Oxen Draw Business.

Will J. Glasser, of the Faribault Theater, Faribault, Minn., sends a photograph of a prairie schooner drawn by a team of oxen, which he used to advertise the Selig release of "The Danites." He writes that it helped to draw a good business during the run of that two-reel feature. He does not give particulars, but where such a feature is used it should be started out a day or so before the reel arrives with a "Coming Soon" on a separate banner tacked over the "To-night" on the full sign. Have the team at the depot to meet the train and load the reels into the wagon. If you are in a hurry to get them to the theater, a more rapid mode of conveyance can be adopted as soon as the station is out of sight, but the cart should keep on to the theater and much ado made over a dummy package on its arrival. Then keep the team on the streets for the rest of the day. A couple of red-shirted emigrants marching beside the wagon with guns on their shoulders to protect the team from chance Indians will help the effect, as will a woman and child in the back of the wagon.



This feature will attract attention anywhere and can be used for a score of different releases. It is not difficult to "fake" a wagon and horses may be used where oxen may not be had, though the latter are pretty apt to be found within easy reaching distance if you know where to look.

A Passion Play Program.

L. C. Van Orsdale, of the Bronx Hippodrome, sends a program of music for the "Passion Play," produced there April 2nd. There the orchestra consists of organ, two violins, 'cello and drums, and this program was played:

PART I.

Overture—"From the Messiah" .... Handel
" "Behold, a Virgin Shall Conceive" .... "Messiah"
" "For Unto Us a Child Is Born" .... "Messiah"
" "Ave Maria" .... Gounod

PART II.

Selections—"The Palms" .... Faure

" "Holy, Holy, Holy" .... J. B. Dyke
Sextette from "Lucia de Lammermoor," by our Favorites.

It is too late to be of service to others this season, but it is worth while filing for future reference. In Part I a better form would have been to drop the top line and announce "Behold, a Virgin Shall Conceive," from the "Messiah"—Handel, and it is apparent that the Bach-Gounod "Ave Maria" was used. Gaul should be given credit for "The Holy City."

We are inclined to question the wisdom of following this impressive production with a rollicking farce, with music to suit. The argument that it sends the people out in good humor is all very well, but the four reels alone would have been better than five, and if five were essential it would have been better had some photoplay of reverential spirit preceded the "Passion Play." There are many to whom the intrusion of the farce is a shock and much of the effect is lost. It is almost like following the descent from the Cross with a song and dance.

An Opening Advertisement.

Roscoe C. Cuneo, of the Star Theater, Upper Sandusky, Ohio, sends in some advertising that announced the reopening of that house in enlarged and very much improved form. One of these is odd and effective. It merely says:

> NEWS IN THE ADS.
> Yes, there is news in the ads—news that is timely and worth while. For instance, one of to-day's ads tells of the opening of the Star Theater.

This drops three inches across two columns and we think that it attracted more attention to the opening than the other advertisement with double the space. This runs:

> You Are Invited To The > STAR THEATER OPENING
> TO-NIGHT.
> The opening of the remodeled, enlarged STAR THEATER, an event awaited with much interest by the people of this city and vicinity, occurs to-night. All improvements are completed. The transformed STAR THEATER is twice its former size, is equipped with a new steel ceiling of elaborate design, with artistic decorations. Three hundred comfortable seats have been installed, as has also an up-to-date indirect lighting system, which permits the theater to be continually illuminated. Of special importance is the new MIRROR SCREEN, which gives a life-like, clear picture, a picture that is restful to the eyes.
> SPECIAL PROGRAM
> A Bison two-reel feature film, "The Deserter," will be shown to-night as an opening night specialty. This is a first-run film. It depicts a tale of Indian and frontier life on a large and extensive plan. It is well and skillfully acted and the scenic effects must be seen to be properly appreciated. Special music program. Admittance, 5 cents. Don't miss this opening night.

Overlooking a Point.

It would seem that a good point was overlooked in the casual reference to the Bison "101 Ranch" reel. Here was a smashing big subject for an opening attraction, yet it is passed over with a placidity that does not rouse interest. Something like this would have been better:

> An Amazing Opening Attraction.
> Recently the Bison Company has made a special arrangement with the proprietors of the famous "101 Ranch Wild West Show" to use that tremendous organization in the production of a series of gigantic photoplays in which some four hundred players, soldiers and Indians appear against the magnificent backgrounds of California scenery. One of the best of these, "The Deserter," in two reels—two thousand feet of spectacular splendor—will form the feature of our opening program.
> You've seen big Western pictures, but never anything like this.

The play's the thing and even in an opening announcement we think more space could have been given the Bison feature even if it made necessary the elimination of reference to the new steel ceiling. A new steel ceiling is not one-half as interesting as a two-reel Bison and not as many people will come to see the ceiling.

A Ticket and a Tickler.

Something out of the ordinary comes from St. Joseph, Mo., where the electric company sent out a card, of which this is a part:

> COMPLIMENTARY TICKET TO ORPHEUM THEATER
> Compliments of the > ST. JOSPEH RAILWAY, LIGHT, HEAT & POWER CO.
> This ticket will be honored on presentation by Bearer for one
> Admission to any performance
> March 25th, 26th, and 27th
> There will be exhibited on these dates a comedy picture entitled "Every Husband's Opportunity." We want you to see it and sure you will find it both instructive and amusing.
> F. C. BARRINGTON, Sales Manager.

The picture is an advertising reel featuring electrical appliances and the other half of the card carried a mailing card feature and an order for an electrical iron on trial. The "window envelopes" were used and the cards were addressed from the company's list of current users. Something similar can be done by any exhibitor who can get in touch with the various utilities companies.

Booming Bison Better.

Here is a postcard sent out by the Idle Hour, Aberdeen, S. D. It is on a regular postcard instead of a private mailing card and is a very good imitation of actual typing, being printed through a silk ribbon. Coming in the mail to a select list this should be a business bringer.

> Spectacular! Thrilling!! Exciting!!!
> Aberdeen, S. D., March 25, 1912.
> Dear Friend—The management of the Idle Hour wishes to call your attention to the second release of the famous 101 Bison "THE INDIAN MASSACRE" in two reels. It is a wonderful subject and considered even better than our first release, "The War On the Plains." Through the films runs a story of a mother love. Remember, this great subject will be at the Idle Hour Wednesday and Thursday, March 27th and 28th.
> Yours truly,
> C. T. SMITHERS.
> P. S.—A third one of these famous 101 Bison films, entitled "The Battle of the Redmen," will be shown the following week, Wednesday and Thursday.

Wesley is Told.

A couple of weeks ago we printed details of Wesley's egg contest. It will be remembered that he offered two tickets for the best answer to the old question, "Which came first, the hen or the egg?" He writes that the prize went to the Pittsfield, Mass., Daily Eagle, which explains that the egg was created, left out in the sun and the chicken was hatched. They got the two tickets, but we would like to know where they got the authority for their statements.

Wesley also explains the "hat" card recently referred to and sends another, which commences "You Dam Fool" and goes on to explain it is not the chapeau of the person addressed, but belongs to another who wants his own property. It seems Wesley lost his own hat recently and got the cards out to protect his own property.

Another Snapper.

And here's something in his characteristic vein that will be found useful by many exhibitors, either in its present form or by adaptation. In the original the "Don't" is about a ten-line letter and the rest in twelve point. It goes: > sit around and pass the time away; that's what the clock is for. You will thank your lucky stars after seeing this show. It's a "joy getter" in the first race, make you glad in the second, and there isn't a "gloom" in the third. It's a lovable, livable world and you will enjoy the sermon better tomorrow after seeing the Moving Pictures. That's "handing it" out some, but you can't get away from the truth. Cast your optics on this! I have never chopped down any cherry trees, but I am going to tell the truth, it's a great show.

Testimony.

George R. Thrower, of the Lyric, Boone, Iowa, writes that he finds the local happening slide a great business getter. It is apparent that he did not see one of the early issues of this department in which this slide feature was suggested, but perhaaps there are enough more to make it worth while repeating. In brief, Mr. Thrower has arranged with a local photographer to photograph all local events of importance, the ice harvest, a high stage of water, a washout or wreck on the railroad and similar happenings. The slide is made without cost to the house, the photographer being given credit. Home happenings always interest and this can be worked into a big feature. It is suggested that the line used read, "Slide made by Blank, the photographer, of whom copies may be had," since many persons might wish to obtain a photograph for preservation. By making the original photograph postcard size and reducing for the slide in the same proportions, they could be sold inexpensively. After the slide is made the negative should be lettered "Lyric Theater Series No. —" and a number given. In this way the house shares the advertising.

About Photographs.

A better display is given "The Sioux's Cave of Death" and "Chumps" and on all pages is an underline suggesting "Send your children to the Matinee;" a line that others might adopt where the local ordinances are not enforced against unattended children.

The Princess sends a photograph which we are unable to use, as it merely shows the house front. Will those who contribute illustrative matter to this department please note that only photographs which tell an advertising story can be used. We would like to use cuts of theaters and of the men who run them, but these belong to the general news columns and should not be sent to this department, but addressed directly to the editor. We are always glad to receive photographs of special advertising features, but ask that details be sent regarding cost, etc., where practicable.

Fighting Back.

Dante's "Inferno" was advertised in Hopkinsville, Ky., recently and instead of turning on his back and curling up his toes George A. Bleich, who runs the Princess, put on extra steam. In one issue of the Kentucky New Era he has a cross page four inch advertisement of Brutus and 22 inches of single column advertising, 46 inches in all. This, of course, can be done only where the rates are low, but the point is that Mr. Bleich does not regard himself as beaten in advance when a State Rights subject comes to town. He gets the best of the regular stuff and fights back, 46 inches against 15. And there isn't a line in his stuff about the Inferno. He figures out he'll pay for his own advertising and let the other fellow pay for his own. He just makes it apparent that he has some unusually good stuff that you will want to see. The State Rights stuff is growing more common, and this is a problem that the local house will find more frequently. The only way to meet the outside attraction is to mind your own business and come back at the opposition with the best you can get to offer. Do not appeal to your regulars to stand by you against the invader. Take it for granted that they'll just naturally have to come to see your show—but be sure you've something that will make worth while their coming.

The PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

CONDUCTED BY EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

In Explanation.

OUR apologies are due a large number of persons who have sent in the price of Technique of the Photoplay without having received copies. These should have been in the office three weeks ago and it was in that expectation that the advertisement was inserted a couple of weeks ago, which was very liberally responded to. The book has now arrived and all orders have been filled. Those who queried the non-receipt of the book and received no reply are courteously reminded that the death of our Chief disorganized the regular routine of the office with the sad extra duties imposed by his death and we are sure that this explanation will be accepted as apology. Please note that orders should be addressed to the paper and not to the editor of this department.

Why Not Photoplay?

We clip this from Spectator's comment in the Dramatic Mirror for April 3rd:

> Reference to "scenario writing" brings to mind a remark dropped to The Spectator the other day by Charles Gaskill, a well-known and capable member of the craft, to the effect that he could not see why the name "scenario" should be applied to the picture play. They are no longer scenarios; they are motion picture plays, fully worked out, briefly, it is true, but with all essential details even to significant speeches and captions. This, of course, as to the workable picture play. The Spectator has long had a growing opinion to the same conclusion, and, if he is not mistaken, Epes W. Sargent has expressed a similar thought. Mr. Sargent explained, if memory serves right, that the employment of the word scenario in designating a picture play is one of the reasons why the copyright authorities have been slow to grant all copyright privileges to motion picture plays. The scenario of a stage play cannot be copyrighted and it was natural to rule that the same would apply to a scenario of a picture play. But if a motion picture play is not an incomplete scenario, but a complete motion picture dramatic composition, the case is entirely different. At any rate, why not drop the use of "scenario" altogether when applied to a picture play of the completed kind?

Spectator quotes correctly when he gives it as his belief that we regard the use of the word "scenario" as one reason for the refusal to copyright photoplay scripts, though of late scripts have been received for copyright and probably will be unless the Townsend bill becomes a law, but this is as good a time as any to start a movement against the erroneous application of the term "scenario" to the script of a motion picture. Spectator seems willing and we think we can speak for William Lord Wright. If every photoplaywright will persistently refuse to make use of the word and spread the gospel wherever he can the lonesome editors will soon follow suit (Mr. Gaskill is photoplay editor of the Vitagraph and already in line) and "scenario" will be returned to its proper application as a sketch of a dramatic composition and not the composition itself.

Extracting the Sting.

The newest Lubin wrinkle is to take the sting out of the tail of the rejection slips sent out. We have noted before the detailed list of reasons and now note that "Too immoral" has been changed to merely "Immoral" in accordance with our suggestion. To those whose work seems to be worth while the following sting-extractor goes on a separate slip. If you don't get the special slip you can know that "Not available" means that you are stung:

> SPECIAL NOTICE.
> Although obliged to reject your scenario for the reason marked on our rejection slip (herewith enclosed) we wish you to know that your work, in many ways, shows that you have talent for scenario writing.
> We have accordingly made note of your name, and in the future will give special attention to any work you submit to us.
> Awaiting, with interest, your next effort, we remain,
>
> Yours very truly,
> LUBIN MANUFACTURING CO.,
> (Scenario Department.)

Tips On the Market.

Our thanks are due Karl R. Coolidge, of Los Angeles, for the most practical contribution yet made to this department. Mr. Coolidge lists some companies which do not appear in the regular lists. Mostly these are companies making negatives to sell to the trade and they do not appear in advertisements. Not all of them are permanent, but Mr. Coolidge appears to have had satisfactory dealings with those he mentions save in the matter of price and for that reason his list is given. We have already mentioned the Fox Company, but some of the others are new to us. The Fox Company was in the courts over financial matters not long ago, but it did not appear in the record whether this was due to insolvency or studio troubles with employees, and from the report here given it would appear to be the latter.

Mr. Coolidge makes the suggestion that others contribute of their store of information and as he practises what he preaches the suggestion comes with good grace. This page is open to all writers who have something to say about the market or conditions and this goes double for the scenario editors, many of whom have alreaday made the discovery that this page brings them to all real scenario writers and most of the others.

Mr. Coolidge writes:

> I note in a recent issue of the World that contributions from photoplaywrights are desirable, and submit the following notes of Southern Caalifornia companies, which I think may prove of value to others.
> The Imp Western Company, 309 Delta Building, Los Angeles, wants scripts requiring four leading characters, and with few interior scenes. No scripts featuring cowboy or Indian stunts.
> The Fox Motion Picture Company, 4600 Sunset Boulevard, Los Angeles, is a new company and in the market for all classes of stories. They are prompt in their dealings. Western scenarios, with few or no interior settings, are in demand.
> The United States Motion Picture Company, Lake Shore and Temple Streets, Los Angeles, is still another newly-formed concern that appears to be making good, but I am not informed as to their particular wants.
> The G. Melies Company, Santa Paula, Cal., appears to be in urgent need of Westerns, but no blood-and-thunder stuff.
> The Western Pathe Company, Edendale, Cal., advises me that all their scenarios are written by their director, Mr. James Young Deer.
> The Angelus Motion Picture Company, 137 East Avenue 49, Los Angeles, is at work, but I do not know their wants.
> The Nestor Film Company, Sunset and Gower Streets, Hollywood, Cal., wants short, quick comedies and dramas, but no Westerns.
> The Pacific Motion Picture Company, 1614 Temple Street, Los Angeles, is asking for dramatic and comedy scenarios, with a small cast and little acting parts. No Western.
> The Annex Motion Picture Company, National City, Cal., advertises for Western and Spanish scripts.
> The Biograph Company, Pico and Georgia Streets, Los Angeles, offers to buy high-class comedy, but seem to be well stocked with other classes.
> The Bear Motion Picture Company, 311 West 9th Street, Glendale, Cal., has begun operations, but their wants are not known to me.
> The Lubin Mfg. Company, 1625 Fleming Street, Los Angeles, Cal., uses Western and Spanish stories, and appears to be in urgent need of them.
> I shall be glad from time to time to keep the World informed of the operations of the various companies in this section. I would suggest that others in a position to get the "inside dope" on the studios, put their knowledge into print. I might add that the Western branches of the various companies pay a far smaller price than the home offices for photoplays and it might be well for those who value their work to name their price instead of submitting at the usual rates, which insures them from being handed out those measly five bone slips.

A Matter of Envelopes.

We have received two complaints in the past week that stamps sent photoplay companies for instruction sheets did not bring those sheets in return. We were to blame for one of these complaints because we spoke of the slips that the companies would send.

A stamp is the smallest part of the work of answering a letter. When merely the stamp comes in there must be provided an envelope. This must be addressed, and the address studied from the letter. Then the stamp must be affixed. All of this could be avoided were a stamped envelope sent and the common business courtesy should suggest to the person asking a favor that the burden be made as light as possible.

Most companies require a stamped and addressed envelope for form sheets and very properly confiscate stamps without envelopes. Any communication requiring an answer which is to the advantage of the writer, should be similarly supplied. Make it a point never to send out a letter that is not accompanied by a stamped and addressed envelope where a reply is required and you will make easy the job of the recording angel who writes down profanity against editors.

It's a slight omission, but remember that you are but one of twenty-five or fifty offenders and you will appreciate the fact that in the aggregate your offense is heavy.

One On the School.

It comes a little late but the other day a photoplaywright spoke of an experience he had last summer with one of the long distance photoplay pedagogues.

Being a cautious person he had his photoplays revised before he sent them out and thought them rather good himself, but about the end of the fourth five dollar payment he sent in a photoplay that seemed to rouse the ire of his instructor. With emphasis tempered with regret the professor opined that the story was impossible, no credit to a pupil of such a good school, and stated his positive belief that no editor would touch the script "with a ten-foot pole," a time-worn and rather discouraging simile.

It was well meant advice, but the authority of the statement was somewhat tempered by the fact that the very next day the Imp Company sent a check for $25 for the self-same story, possibly reaching it with a longer pole. The script was sent the Imp and the school in the same mail. The school didn't like it, but it made good with the Imp.

It's one on the school, and one reason why we do not favor the school idea. Most of the instructors could profit by some competent instruction themselves and some we know would not know a motion picture camera if they saw one.

Kitchell On Credits.

William H. Kitchell, who has sold enough photoplays to almost get fat, writes as follows:

> Me for the Seattle man's paragraph in this week's World. Not one person in a hundred knows what a scenario is, and the concession in allowing "Scenario by ——— ——— on the film doesn't amount to much. As few people get more than a glimpse of the average title, anyhow, I fail to see where the good comes to the author. Personally I would give twice as much to see my name announced in the trade papers as the author of the film as I would to see it on the film title. How many manufacturers see other makes of film, and if they did, how long would it take for an author to work up a trade reputation by having his name on the film title, especially if the film happens to be badly produced?

As we have before explained, Mr. Kitchell is one of those unfortunate persons who live in Newark and never come to New York. Not only that, but he rides on the water wagon and still thinks that the Newark team can play baseball. How any person on the water wagon can imagine that the aforesaid team knows more about baseball than it gleans from the sporting pages argues that he has a vivid imagination—which is one of the requirements of the scenario writer.

But Mr. Kitchell makes a very good point when he argues that few persons get much of the title. "Threading up" on the first frame is a practise not confined to Newark by any means. We have seen a five-reel show right here in New York where we had to look at the posters on the way out to discover the titles, and where this practise is so widespread, the use of the author's name on the title is of small value.

Mr. Kitchell makes an even stronger point when he argues that few makers of film ever see the products of other makers, even in the same division. No credit in the studios comes from the practise, yet we think that the use of the author's name is an important concession and that it will make for his ultimate success. Comparatively few persons read the author's name in the magazine headings, and yet the names of well known authors are valuable to magazine makers above those of the second flight of writers.

Long before William Lord Wright took up the matter, we spoke in favor of giving both the author and producer credit, though not in such distinct and concrete form as does Mr. Wright. But let us have the credit in the film title, in the bulletin or bulletin sheet and in the trade papers. What is worth doing is worth doing well and completely, and Mr. Kitchell calls attention to an essential fact when he reminds us that comparatively few houses show the title in full. Even where the title is run it does not always run full length and flashes out before more than the name of the photoplay can be obtained. Let the author have fullest publicity and we shall have more authors who are worth the publicity. The idea is a good one.

Selecting a Topic.

A welcome but modest visitor to this department gives some interesting hints as to selecting topics for photoplays. He writes in part:

> The best school for the photoplaywright is, of course, the motion-picture theater. But in studying the films in the screen, for Heaven's sake don't let yourself be led to imitate the subject matter of the films you see! If you see a cowboy story don't rush home and write a cowboy story. Write the cowboy story, if you know it. But that is another matter.
> The first question for an earnest photoplaywright to ask himself is: What is the most interesting thing I have to tell people? Then develop that thing, whatever it is, into a situation, or series of situations, with the suitable characters.
> The second question is: How can I get this story convincingly to the screen? In answering this question you must resort to your power of visualization. If you aren't able to visualize properly, you had better quit trying to write scenarios. As you write your photoplay, you must see it on the screen. The more vividly you are able to see it, the better you can do your work.

It cannot be too often said that if you can't "see" your picture yourself you cannot make others see it. A photoplay is a story told in action instead of words, but it must be fully told in action and insert. Don't trust to your own imagination. Get the advice of someone who has not your knowledge of the plot. If they can tell without your explanation it is apt to be right. If you see Jim and Nell talking you know what they talk of because you wrote the story. But can the other fellow tell? Ask him.

The Suffragette.

A correspondent, who was answered in the last Inquiry Department, asks this interesting question:

> In regard to the nom de plume. Is there any objection to one using a nom de plume if he prefers to do so? Is there any objection to a woman using a man's name, if she considers that by so doing her story will stand a better chance of acceptance? Isn't it true that, "all things being equal," the man writer will be given preference over the woman? Suppose two stories are equally good, and the editor has to decide between them? I sent out a scenario a dozen times, under my usual pen name (female) and the last time, signed simply the initial of my first name, just as a trial. The scenario was accepted. Was this simply a chance?

It was purely and simply chance. We do not know a studio in the country where the fact that a feminine name is signed to a scenario would militate against its acceptance. Now and then some woman gets in the black books because she makes a nuisance of herself, but the same applies to the masculine photoplay writer with a red-headed temper and the mere fact of sex is not considered.

The use of a nom de plume is not advisable when checks come in or authors are required to swear to an affidavit as to originality in order to get a fifteen dollar check, and in every way we are against the use of pen names on general principles. If you want to sell scripts and do not desire your name used, clear through a friend who can sign for you, but it is by far the best to hold to your own name.

INQUIRIES

J. A. M.—J. B. Sherry is given as the old settler in Bison's "The Indian Massacre." We don't know about the black beard. We cannot tell you a single habit cherished by James Cruze. The only habit he has that we know anything about is his habit of playing for the pictures. Changes of a radical nature in studio conditions make it impracticable to obtain the name of the Power player you ask for. There are several leading men in the Thanhouser Company. There is no particular one with an underscore under the "the."

J. M. P.—We do not know where the former Nestor player you ask for now is. Sorry. You can't get in to see the pictures made unless you know someone in authority well enough to ask as a personal favor. You should have at least $500 to start a store show. This will buy a screen, a machine, some cheap chairs and cover other expenses, but it will not provide an ornamental front nor cover the repairs that local ordinances in many towns require. In your town you should have at least $2,500 to $3,000. When an operator is required to be licensed the operator must have a license whether he owns the theater in which he works or is employed on salary.

X. Y. Z.—It seems to us that you are a little hurried in demanding the return of your script so quickly. Let one lie at least four weeks before making inquiry and another four before you get really worried. For a time this company was badly upset in the handling of scripts, but recent advices seem to indicate a change for the better. If you want a receipt enclose a postal with your story in the form outlined in a recent issue. If you want to send out the script elsewhere write the company formal notice, let two other persons see that this is the letter you are sending and send it by registered mail asking for a return receipt at the time of registry. In the letter merely state that you are sending out another copy of the story and that the copy in their possession, and which they refuse to return, must not be used by them. But allow a decent interval to elapse. All of this has been treated repeatedly in this department. Read the paper regularly and if you are a newcomer, get the back files.

T. deV. H.—We believe it is the Essanay slip that is titled "How to Write a Photoplay." Other companies issuing slips are the Lubin and Melies.

REP.—We do not know whether the lady left the company to join another or with matrimonial intent. It's not in our line. The Pathe Freres offer photographs of players for sale. Mr. Walthall is back with Pathe after a long absence with Reliance. We do not know about the others, but have heard nothing that leads us to believe the reports correct.

B. K. H.—Miss Marin Sais was the girl in Kalem's "A Tenderfoot's Troubles." The other matter will be arranged for shortly. Several have made the suggestion. Thanks for your interest

J. F. P.—The list of studio addresses will be sent if you will send a stamped and self-addressed envelope.

BABE.—It is reported that Miss Lawrence will return to the Lubin Company very soon, but at present she is in Europe on a vacation. She has not signed with another company.

F. A. L.—Photoplay or "scenario" form is writing the story in action, since the story is told in action. This action is divided into scenes. The synopsis is a very brief sketch of the photoplay for the guidance of the Editor. There should be no conversation used in either action or synopsis. If you want to find out all about it, send a dollar to the publishers for a copy of "Technique of the Photoplay."

J. C. L.—The business address of the Vitagraph is 116 Nassau Street, New York City. The studio is at East 15th Street and Locust Avenue, Brooklyn. Send a stamped and self-addressed envelope for a complete list of addresses if you want one.

DISCOURAGED M. P. W.—If you sent an addressed stamped envelope for a reply you should have heard from the Imp by now. Write again and enclose a reply envelope.

C. L. D. and A. R. S.—Why do you ask the same question twice? Roswell Johnson, of the Lubin Company, is not the son of Arthur Johnson, but the child of one of the camera men with the company.

C. B. P.—Our advertising columns last week will give you the information you desire. See page 151.

C. G. S.—We do not know exactly where the photoplays were made, but the Essanay appears to have been made in Chicago, and we think the Edison at the home studio in New York. The Essanay Western section is at San Rafael, Cal.

J. F. M. D.—The synopsis, as has been frequently explained, is merely a guide to the editor as to the style of a story. Most companies will not accept the synopsis alone and those which do seldom accept the undeveloped synopsis. The number of words used to tell the story has nothing whatever to do with the length of the finished product. The guide is length of film, not length of manuscript. If you will read the page for photoplay writers regularly you will find much in it that you seem to need.

H. A. P.—See answer to T. deV. H. for the companies issuing sample photoplay scenario sheets. Most assuredly you cannot sell a second time what you have already sold once. Even if you cannot find anything in the copyright act that refers to photoplays, you'll find statutes in the common laws in relation to obtaining money under false pretenses that will suit your case beautifully. If you get a prize for a photoplay the rights to the production of the same lie with the company. The prize is merely a higher payment than usual and it becomes their property. But if you will turn to the first page of the Copyright Law and read lines 18 to 27 inclusive, you will find in lines 20 and 21 that the holder of copyright is given the right "to vend any manuscript or any record thereof" and we believe that this applies to photoplays, even if the sections relating to dramatization will not hold. But this is not a question of copyright, but of common honesty.

LUCKY.—The Aviator in Thanhouser's "Flying to Fortune," is not included in the cast supplied by the company. Harry Pollard was the Hunchback in "The Worth of a Man," an Imp production, and Owen Moore was the younger man in Majestic's "Honor Thy Father."

RICHARD ROE.—Any exhibitor may handle the National program if he wants to, but not in connection with Sales Company or Licensed films. Your photoplay plot is not only unavailable, but it's old.

TEXAS.—"Sunset or Her Only Romance," is the official title for the Vitagraph release of March 16th, which was originally announced as "The Ranch by the Sea." Miss Bessie Eyton was the convict's wife in Selig's "Those Who Suffer." The New Orleans section of the Kalem Company made "The Bucktown Romance." The leads were Miss Eileen Errol, Thomas Moore and Stuart Holmes. Miss Jessie McAllister was Mrs. Farrette in Edison's "The House with the Tall Porch." See answer to J. C. L. Howard Missimer was the Tramp in Essanay's "Cupid's Leap Year Pranks." "Location" questions are not answered as a rule.

S. H. M.—The Imp Company does not seem to place the person you mention. William Robert Daly was the erring brother in the company's "After Many Years."

"THE BURIAL OF THE MAINE" (Selig), April 2.—A glorious picture; not because the Selig camera has done its work in a specially glorious way, for the photographs are merely good; but it is a picture to stir patriotic emotions from one end to the other of this land. Get a bugler and have him blow taps as though far off, behind the curtain. The big hulk was covered with as noble a garment of rust and barnacles as ever clung to a ship that has done its duty. Slowly they towed her out past Moro Castle to the place assigned in deep water. Then the ships drew apart and left her.

Slowly she sank until her decks were nearly to the water. The sea was rolling. It seemed as though she was being submerged. Some one in the audience hoarsely whispered, "She is going." But no; bravely she rose when the billow passed, as though she could struggle still. Again she sank, or seemed to sink, and again and still again she rose. But now, as she dipped, the waters whitened at her prow; the teeth of the billow seemed to gleam clear across her deck. She began to tip slowly forward.

A tall flagstaff had been erected above her and an immense flag was fluttering from it. As it bent downward the rising spray seemed to moisten it and it drooped, and now the spume in the sunshine around it gave to it a nimbus of gleam. The main deck, the flagstaff and the flag disappeared; the stern was the last to sink. There was a ripple where she went down and the waves above her were as waves have been since the beginning.

"ME AND BILL" (Selig), April 4.—An idyl of American life. It begins in about the 30's with four school children (two girls and two boys, very pleasing), shows a love story's climax in the 40's, and ends in the 60's, after wartime scenes and wartime sorrows. The one thing this delightful picture lacks is good photography, photography that was worthy of it, we mean. The pictures are clear enough, but lack atmosphere. It takes art to photograph a paling fence and make it pleasing. The scenes ring true, for the most part, and are emotional, effective and got over to the audience, that plainly showed that it was moved. There have been more realistic and more sincere battle scenes than this picture has, and the death of the daughter of Bill (was it by suicide?) when the news came that her lover had died in battle, didn't add any real effectiveness to the picture, rather it weakened it. The picture has quality, plenty of it, and is a feature. It tells well, although not with entire sincerity, the American story.

"A LUCKY MIX-UP" (Essanay), April 4.—A farce comedy that was laughed at more in the gallery then in the auditorium. The man was courting the wrong girl; he had lost his sweetheart. She was a flirt and he wanted to make her jealous over "La Belle Daisy," whom he thought he didn't know. He succeeded. There was a dressing-room scrap at the theater and two fine dresses suffered. Daisy turns out to be the lost sweetheart. The story was well pictured, such as it is; it is clear and doesn't drag and the photographs are good. In some places it may seem very funny, for it is also well acted.

"A MAN WORTH WHILE" (Melies), April 4.—A cowboy love story that is not very fresh or thrilling with a chase as its chief feature. The horses of the heroine and her girl chum are stolen by the outlaws. The hero's friends follow intending to lynch the thieves. The heroine sends the hero to stop the lynching. The sheriff and his posse are also on the trail of the fugitives. Some in the audience may have been interested, but others laughed at wrong times. It is a filler.

"TWO KNIGHTS IN A BARROOM" (Edison), April 3.—A tramp's dream brings to life two suits of armor in the barroom. He has work for them to do and they do him faithful service righting the wrongs the world has done him. It is a trick film farce. The dream is funny; but the picture is a long while getting down to its story and the first part drags. The people seemed to enjoy the farce. The photographs are good. It is a desirable filler.

"THE SPANISH REVOLT OF 1836" (Kalem), April 3.—The quality of these Kalem Californian historical pictures is well known. The story of this is somewhat better than usual. Pretty girls, pretty gowns, pretty scenes and a clearly told love story. It is pretty well photographed; but it is not very well acted nor very convincing. It is a filler.

"TIGER'S CLAWS" (Pathe), April 3.—A melodrama in a house party setting. It is written on the good, old pattern for such and, while it doesn't convince at all, it gets considerable charm from the players in it. It is a triangle love story with a graceful, slip of a girl for villainess. This young lady is very winsome in, or perhaps in spite of, her role. The photographs are good. The picture was played by young people; this makes it much better than the mere trite story, and we call it a good filler.

"THE SEVENTH SON" (Vitagraph), April 3.—A wartime picture. A mother, played by Mrs. Maurice, is shown as giving six sons to the Union. The seventh is timid, deserts during a battle and is condemned to death. Lincoln hears the old mother's plea and gives her back the seventh son. We do not think that this impersonation of Lincoln is as good as that in former Vitagraph pictures, especially that in "The Battle Hymn." He seems to be not thoughtful, but heavy and slow because of dullness. The makeup for this role is perfect. The audience watched the picture with its home scenes, battle scenes and White House scenes, with close attention and applauded. The photography is good.

"THE PUNISHMENT" (Biograph), April 4.—A tragic love story in costume, with scenes in an orange grove, a poor man's hut, a glorious marble palace of the rich land owner, etc. The picture gives many fine scenes; but lacks that absolute clearness that makes a story smooth. This is partly due to confusing leaders, partly to seeming incongruities in the costuming that keeps attention partly from the narrative; and it is partly due to lack of fineness in the acting. It is not up to the best Biograph picture. The photographs are good, some of the scenes are perfect.

"HIS CHANCE TO MAKE GOOD" (Selig), April 1.—There have been a good many pictures showing the regeneration of criminally inclined youths, but most of these have been merely tracts that desired to get their meaning over, rather than to be true. We like this picture much more than such; because the scenario writer took pains to think out what was reasonable and probable, and the producer has presented it in a convincing way. It is unusually natural in its acting. The picture shows imagination and experience; it gets over and stirs human sympathies deeply. It is well photographed and we commend it highly as a substantial feature. It is a picture that can be shown in a church, where pictures of real life are wanted.

"THE SACRIFICE" (Lubin), April 3.—Miss May Buckley plays in this picture the role of a dancer. Mr. Harry Meyer plays, opposite to her, a man who made a compact with a widow, whose son was infatuated with the dancer, that he would save her boy. The sacrifice was made later by this man. The dancer had fallen in love with him and he sacrificed his true love, which was for the widow, rather than so meanly wound the dancer whom he had courted. The scenario tells no vital nor even very interesting story, but gives the players a good chance to interpret human emotions, and it is their fine work that makes the picture effective, and makes it a desirable filler, perhaps a feature on ordinary occasions. It has some very pretty scenes and is clearly photographed.

"CHARLIE'S REFORM" (Edison), April 5.—A picture with a purpose; it shows the value and need of social centers for work among young people. It is acted by good players, but gives them little chance to show imagination, because of the artificial way in which the situation is developed. The picture's first concern is plainly to make its lesson clear. Several of the Edison pictures, with ethical or educative purposes, have been very effective; but this is not so successful. We commend it, chiefly for its interesting showing of the conditions which social centers were instituted to combat. It is, indeed, a powerful object lesson. The photographs are good.

"TEACHING A LIAR A LESSON" (Essanay), April 5.—This situation has been done before many times ("Count Henry," by Solax, of a couple of weeks ago, is one recent instance), but it is amusing still. The liar tells great stories of adventure to his sweetheart. They are illustrated for us and, in between the adventures, we are given amusing glimpses of the liar lying. He plays the part very well. The boys overhear and give him a real adventure that shows him up to the girl. It is very well photographed and makes a good filler.

"SHALL NEVER HUNGER" (Lubin), April 4.—Mr. Arthur Johnson puts a good deal of imagination into this picture. Not all of its roles are so well played, but it makes a strong impression. The situation seems fresh. It has many possibilities not utilized yet. We expected an entirely different ending. But that is neither here nor there; the picture (excepting the minister, who was not very fortunately cast in this role; he had usually done much better work) gets over as a picture of life's possibilities. Mr. Johnson plays a starving man who reads on a sign that the minister, in the church, is to preach on, "Shall Never Hunger," as a text. He stumbles in, and comes forward to faint on the altar steps. The photography is clear. This picture will be very acceptable in Protestant churches (it shows a Protestant service, that is why), or at private entertainments. It is not a great picture, but a fairly strong one. We call it a feature.

"THE SCHOOLM'AM OF STONE GULCH" (Essanay), April 5.—A good farce comedy, romantic and pleasingly acted by acceptable players. It is very amusing in its picturing of a certain kind of young lady (the schoolm'am) who is not easy to court except by the man who knows how. There was a cowboy in the village who did know. It is fresh. The schoolm'am seemed almost as much afraid of the pistol the cowboy left with her as a protection against Indians (there were none), as she was of the red men, and her way of carrying it is very laughable. She had refused to ride home from the school with the cowboy, merely because she was spunky. The audience very plainly enjoyed it. The photography is pretty good. It is a fair feature or a very strong Saturday night filler.

"AN EASY MARK" (Thanhouser), April 12.—A very excellent view of the great waiting-room of the Pennsylvania Station in New York, shows the easy mark, a rich widow, arriving in the city on a pleasure trip. A sharper, a "kind" young man, volunteers to show her the sights. He steers her into a good investment, a furnished house for $1,500. Only last month, some one from Aroostook County, Maine, bought Madison Square Garden for $2,000. This old lady didn't lose her money, they tried to sell her her own house. She had them nabbed. It is a good picture with an instructive meaning, and the old lady will waken sympathies also. The photographs, including busy street scenes, are good. It is an ordinary feature and a good, desirable filler.

"THE UNKNOWN VIOLINIST" (Vitagraph), April 6.—A picture with a situation that is very well acted by Mr. Chas. Kent and Mr. Leo Delaney. It also has some fine scenes showing artistic stage craft and lighting effects. But it is not strongly convincing and it is rather slow in some of its scenes. The humanity of the characters is made clear at every step of the progress by the acting. The photography is very good. We don't dare call it a feature, but it is a good filler.

"THE ILLUMINATION" (Vitagraph), April 6.—A large audience seemed to watch this Biblical picture with the closest attention. It is a picture of the first Holy Week. The Christ does not appear in the picture, but a bright light shines from an unseen source, outside of the picture, where the Saviour stands. The players do not look directly at the light, but upward, for the most part. This gives a strange effect; and while most of its scenes are tremendously impressive, in one or two of them the light seems unreal, and these scenes are not strong. Exhibitors say that audiences are deeply impressed at all shows by it. It is not a subject that calls strongly for applause. There was no applause.

"THE SINS OF THE FATHER" (Pathe), April 6.—Mr. Paul Panzer plays in this picture, very effectively, the role of a man who is told by his pospective son-in-law that his (the boy's) father, now dead, had been guilty of the crime for which the father-in-law had suffered. The picture's story isn't made very clear, but it can be followed, if watched closely. The audience seemed to be entertained by it. They looked at it and didn't talk very much among themselves. The photographs are good. The acting is good in some scenes. It is a fair filler.

"FOOLING FATHER" (Lubin), April 6.—A farce comedy that kept a titter of laughter awake in a large audience on Broadway on Saturday afternoon. There were only one or two good, hard laughs. We have seen such farces as this get a most chilly reception in one place, and be nearly a scream in another. Sometimes it is due to the sound man with his squawker, but the sound man added very little to this. Everything in it would probably amuse anybody who had never seen motion pictures before. It amused the audience as a whole nearly. The picture was taken in the South; the photographs are good. It is a desirable filler.

"LOVE AND HYPNOTISM" (Cines), April 6.—A somewhat morbid story that gets over pretty well, but there are places where it drags somewhat. The doctor, not at all romantic, rather weird, almost repellent, passionately loves his wife, who is not very youthful. Both get their roles over effectively. The doctor suspects that his wife is not wholly true to him. He hypnotizes her and she repeats in pantomime a love scene that we had just seen enacted in the garden and in which her husband's friend gives her a kiss and a flower. The background for this scene is wind-stirred larches in moonlight. A wicker chair is before them and she is seated. The doctor, having witnessed this scene, accuses her and in despair she tries to drown herself under a stately arched bridge. She is revived, however, by the doctor and forgiven. The people watched it closely, but on inquiry we found that it wasn't popular. The photographs are very fair.

"A ROAD AGENT'S LOVE" (Essanay), April 6.—The reviewer, seated in the midst of a large audience and listening to the remarks around him as this picture was shown, wished that he, too, might be thrilled to the core at once, by such romantic pictures as this. Mr. Anderson, playing in these heroic roles of his, is a strong attraction. This doesn't depend on his reputation; it is his roles that attract. He plays them well and it fills ladies with admiration. The pretty heroine of this picture also awakened much sympathy. It is a thoroughly popular picture. It gives thrills by horses in swift motion, by a noble action on the road agent's part, and stirs emotion by well acted love and a well conducted, clear romance. It is very well photographed; a good feature.

"THE CARDINAL'S GIFT" (C. G. P. C.), April 6.—On our list this is given as "The Queen's Necklace." It is a story in costume of the time of Marie Antoinette and deals with a court intrigue, by means of which a very pretty countess gets possession of a diamond necklace. This had been offered to the queen by Cardinal Rohan, but was refused. The countess finds a girl who resembles the queen and uses her to obtain the gems from the cardinal. She is found out, captured, and branded. There are stately scenes, showing gold lace, silks, and brocade, and scenes in a beautiful park. The scene of the execution in which the countess is branded is sensational, but not beautiful. The audience watched it closely. The photographs are good. It is a good picture to show, but not a sure feature.

"ROWDY AND HIS NEW PAL" (Edison), April 6.—A comedy with the Edison bull pup, a remarkably intelligent dog, as its hero. The new pal is a newsie who picked him up on the street and rescued him from a gang of youngsters. The dog's method of furnishing his new pal, who has fallen sick, with food tickled the younger part of the audience very much. The gallery laughed often and heartily; the whole house, however, was entertained and amused. The photographs are good enough, but we dare not call it a feature.

"DR. BROMPTON WATTS' AGE ADJUSTER" (Edison), April 6.—On the same reel, this trick comedy also amused the audience. Dr. Watts has a drink which will make one young and an antidote which will make one old. The effect depends on the amount taken. The results are obtained by substitution of the actor in a youthful make-up, or by putting a child in his place before the camera. The old man who wanted to be young took too much at first; he became first a child and, having taken some more, a monkey. The substitutions are skillfully done. The mechanical work is good.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY," No. 15, April 8.—There is an item from Australia in this week's topical. A military spectacle, it shows Lord Denham presenting stands of colors to the Australian regiments that had taken part in the Boer War. The subject most pertinent before the American public this week is the floods in the Middle West and Mississippi Valley. One item in the topical shows us much of these conditions at Logansport, Ind., on the Wabash. Another item shows Governor Wilson at Fond du Lac, Wis., where he made a speech. It is very good indeed. There is also a picture of Fallieres, the President of France; also a glimpse of spring in Kansas (snowdrifts blocking a train); an episode of the war in Tripoli, and a picture of the Chinese minister to Italy, drinking a health to the new republic.

"FATE'S INTERCEPTION" (Biograph), April 8.—A melodramatic picture with a climax that is very dramatic and very effectively acted. It is not a romantic picture so much as a drama of passion. It is set in Mexico and is told in simple homely backgrounds without the aid of glorious scenery. When the American was called home by his company, he had to leave the pretty Mexican girl. He had taken a fancy to her and she was in love with him. She was passionate and her love turned to hatred when he told her that he was going to leave her. A Mexican loved her, and him she promised to marry if he would cut out the American's false heart. This he agreed to do, and rode fast to the village, went up to the American's room at the hotel, and waited for him. The hotel keeper left him there with the gas lighted. Here is where fate intervenes. The yokel doesn't know about gas. He blows it out, in order to spring upon the American in the dark. He is smothered. It lacks the surer elements of popularity, and, while it was closely watched by an interested audience, it brought out no enthusiasm, no applause. The photographs are fair and it is a competently made picture. We don't dare call it a Saturday night feature.

"THE REFORMATION OF KID HOGAN" (Lubin), April 8.—A reviewer, who sees nearly every picture that is made, sees very often situations that might be called stock properties for producing pathos. They don't affect him any more, but he remembers the time when they did. This picture has very little in it that is new; to the reviewer it was slow; but the people around him watched it closely, following the fortunes of the "Kid" downward from the estate of a successful prize fighter to the street. The girl he liked had dismissed him and he was neglecting his old mother. The girl became a Salvation Army lassie and she found him again, and converted him. To a man who knows street life, it doesn't powerfully convince. Miss Ormi Howley is the lassie and Mr. Jack Holliday is the "Kid." The photographs are good. It is a fair filler.

"THE TIDE OF BATTLE" (Kalem), April 8.—Romance and pretty girls are the saving graces of this picture, rather than convincing thrills. The first scene is set in the great hall of a stately Southern mansion. This appears several times. It is the home of the heroine and her sister, both very pretty and good players, and is one of the best Southern sets we have ever seen. The hero comes to the house, when the Union forces are there, as a spy, and is wounded in trying to escape. The girl carries his message on and not only saves the Confederate camp, but causes the capture of the Union forces. These things do not powerfully convince. The photographs are fair. If it were all as good as the best scene, we could safely call it a popular feature. It has the popular things in good measure. It is a good filler that will be liked, especially in the South.

"BURNT CORK" (Vitagraph), April 8.—A farce comedy, showing the amusing predicament that a man, an amateur burnt-cork comedian, found himself in when his hopeful son put indelible ink in his pot of face smear. The coon color wouldn't come off and his wife didn't recognize him and wouldn't let him in the house after the amateur show was over. Bunny has a short role in it. It brought out several laughs and seemed to be popular. The photography is good enough. It is not a feature, but a good filler. There is a sporting, topical picture, "Pushmobile Races," on the same reel.

"THE BRIGAND" (Cines), April 9.—A rather operatic picture of Sicily, with the lover wounded in a skirmish between brigands and soldiers and later, in hiding. The brave heroine saves him. There is an excellently done scene down a deep well, the lover's hiding place. The photographs are poor. The action is slow. It didn't seem to impress the audience. A filler.

"BRONCHO BILLY AND THE GIRL" (Essanay), April 9.—There have been so many good Broncho Billy pictures that it is no great dispraise to say that this is the poorest of the series. It is not vital or convincing and it is too slow. Some of the spectators were asleep, a half-dozen left while the picture was on; some talked. Yet it is a fair picture. It is well acted and there is some humor in it. The photographs are good enough. It is a filler.

"LAUGHING GAS" (C. G. P. C.), April 9.—A comic character farce giving us the unconscious adventures of a man who wouldn't wake up. The dentist throws him out of the window to get rid of him. There are the usual stunts. They made many laughs, but these were seldom general. The film will hardly amuse those who have seen many pictures. The photography is fair.

"WRASSES, DOG FISH, SOLE AND GURNET" (C. G. P. C.), April 9.—A scientific, educational picture of fish. The introduction shows how naturalists study fish and these scenes were taken on board a yacht. The specimens were taken in aquarium tanks. The film is well photographed and instructive. We commend it as very interesting.

Independent.

"SALVATION SUE" (Champion), April 10.—A salvation lassie, of course, takes the lead in this picture, whose chief purposes are to show the regeneration of a drunkard and to tell a love story. It is the poorest picture that Champion people have released in weeks. It is not as clear as it might have been; it is sentimental, too.

"MARINE PHOTOGRAPHY" (Champion), April 10.—This is very short, indeed, about twenty feet. It is not very instructive.

"THE WEDDING DRESS" (Ambrosio), April 10.—A picture, rather realistic in its treatment, of social life. It deals with a rich girl whom the young man wants to marry, and a poor girl whom he has been making love to. The poor girl is a dress-maker, and has to work all night on a rush order, the wedding dress. On the wedding day she is late with the dress, and meets the groom face to face. In a passion she tears a piece from the wedding dress. It convinces pretty well, yet it isn't at all romantic, and lacks several of the elements of popularity. It appeads to the intellect rather than to the heart.

"A CARICATURE OF A FACE" (Champion), April 8.—A mother-in-law picture, but one that Miss St. Clair, as the mother-in-law who plots to make her daughter's husband receive her, adds grace and charm to, with the good help of Miss Evelyn Francis, as her daughter. The same story was pictured by a Licensed company some weeks ago; but this, except for its too conventional and crowded office scenes, is much more pleasing. The story isn't very vital, nor deeply absorbing, but it is amusing. We enjoyed seeing it again done by these players, and feel safe in calling it a good filler.

"BLUE MOUNTAIN BUFFALOES" (Champion), April 8.—On the same reel is this picture of a herd of buffaloes in a park. It is winter. The snow scenes were well photographed, but the tinting of blue seems a bit too pronounced.

"MEETING HIS MATCH" (Powers), April 9.—An office story. The man who met his match was supercritical (perhaps); he had fired one stenographer for mistakes in letters, but the new one wouldn't take any back talk. She squelched him and he fell in love with her. The picture was played, it seems, to get laughs out of the situation rather than to develop a very possible, human situation that would have amused quietly.

"VIEWS OF BANGKOK, INDIA" (Powers), April 9.—These Powers travel pictures are commendable. This film covers a remarkable amount of intensely interesting tropic country and a great city in India. It is one of the best topical pictures we have seen of this kind. It is fine. The two are desirable, almost a feature. The first part, the farce, might not be acceptable in every Sunday school as it lacks the dignity of truth; but the latter is just the thing for such a purpose.

"NETTIE'S ADVENTURE" (Eclair), April 14.—A picture of French well-to-do people by Mr. Ch. Marin. It is set in a seaside town and introduces us to a love affair between a young man and his mother's seamstress. The mother is strongly opposed. The situation works out to a happy issue. It is not very dramatic, but it is refined and pleasing. The photographs are clear, but the stock seems to have been old; they are crinkley.

"FISHES OF THE TROPICS" (Eclair), April 14.—Loricaires, xphophones paecellos, cyprin and many other forms of strangely marked and curious fish are shown in this instructive and well photographed film. They are aquarium pictures.

"CHECKMATE" (American), April 8.—Apparently, a new "Flying A" stock company plays in this picture a story somewhat different from the La Mesa Company's usual work. It is breezy and would have got over better if the leading man hadn't enjoyed the humor of its situation too much to let him act, at its climax, as well as he does in the early scenes. It is set in New York City and is a good filler.

"THE RANCHMAN'S MARATHON" (American), April 8.—On the same reel is this picture, by the well-known company, and in the familiar out-of-door life vein. It is a sensible, pleasing farce comedy picture with a race between two old, rich ranch-owners for the hand of a disappointed girl. Miss Bush and Mr. Kerrigan play the leads. The photographs are very crinkley but, except in one or two scenes, are clear.

"THE RENEGADE" (Nestor), April 10.—The outlaw has been reported dead; the doctor has married his wife (officially a widow), and the bad man returns. This situation, even the husband's misunderstanding of it, is not new, but on this occasion it gets over. It is so dramatic in its early scenes that the chase with the posse closing in on the bad man seems anti-climax, but the picture ends strongly. The photographs are good and the country beautiful. Miss Victoria Forde, Mr. Gebhart and Mr. Bainbridge play the leads.

"THE PRAIRIE ON FIRE" (Gaumont), April 14.—A very American picture of cowboys and Indians made in France. There are some fine things in it and, what is better still, when we are considering entertainment, it has an entirely new atmosphere. Some of it may make American audiences laugh, but for its beautiful scenes, of which it has several, all will have sincere admiration. The photographs in some scenes are perfect. It is not a feature, but it is a good picture to show.

"A GYPSY'S HEART" (Eclair), April 14.—A romantic comedy by Louis Garbio. It is a pretty picture in well-chosen, interesting backgrounds in some smaller French city. Some of its scenes are very good. The story is human and has a wholesome, pleasant flavor; but it is not a very strong, dramatic picture. It will make a fair filler.

"TUNISIAN FISHERIES" (Eclair), April 14.—On the same reel is this picture (topical) of fishing methods in Tunis, North Africa. Fishing for tunny, the largest 15 feet long, is one of the items. It also shows how the big fish are cut up. The photographs are only fair. It is very interesting.

"THE COWARD" (American), April 11.—The coward had been exasperated by years until, turning, he has killed his man. The picture chiefly shows the man hunt and how the coward, fleeing for his life, bravely did a human act. The story is built on the use-approved pattern, but isn't powerfully convincing. It gives, at times, a chance for acting that is sincere and good. Miss Pauline Bush, Mr. Jack Richardson and Mr. Warren Kerrigan (the coward) play it. It has qualities, and might be a very acceptable picture, even a feature, in some places. The photographs are plain, but not up to standard.

"FALSE TO BOTH" (Imp), April 11.—The false one was a girl and she was false to both of the miners who were out West trying to make a fortune so that they (each thought himself the only one) could marry her. The picture shows, dramatically, how these two men came together and how they both found her out. They become pals. The picture is fairly well acted and has some strength. The photographs are very good, the interiors especially. It is a fair picture, but not a Saturday night feature.

"THE DETECTIVE'S DOG" (Solax), April 10.—A detective's adventure with such thrills as are usually found in stories of its kind, thrills so old that they have been used in burlesque with comic intention. Yet, there is a large body of spectators for whom such doings still carry breathless suspense. The detective is saved from the saw of a mill by his faithful dog. The photographs are good. In some localities this picture will be welcome. "High-brows" will find it very good amusement. It is a gallery picture.

"CURE FOR STAGE FEVER" (Republic), April 9.—An amusing comedy of theatrical life. The heroine is ingenue with a troupe of barnstormers, the real thing, well burlesqued. The rich suitor arranged the troupe and sent it out on its circuit so that his sweetheart could get a taste of the life. Just as he hoped, it worked a cure; but, in the meantime, it amuses us. These players certainly have a tough time of it. The makeups are delightful, the photographs are very fair and the release can safely be called a desirable filler.

"A LOVE OF LONG AGO" (Thanhouser), April 9.—A romance of silk-stocking and slashed-doublet days in Spain or Cuba. Miss Florence La Badie plays the heroine, an archer's daughter. She has fallen in love with a stranger who is denounced and arrested as a spy. With the help of the girl he escapes. The picture was taken in Florida and the castle is the old fort at St. Augustine. The photographs are good. We hardly dare call it a feature; it is nearly one.

"LITTLE HANDS" (Eclair), April 9.—An American picture; it opens with a very pleasing scene, a little child with her grandmother looking at a picture book. A convict escapes from a nearby prison, and begs the grandmother to hide him. The scene changes to an interesting "dive" in Chinatown, New York City, where the escaped prisoner meets his old pals. The prisoner then breaks into a house and finds the little girl asleep. She wants him to take her up and thus saves her life. The aim of this nursery scene was pathos, but it has most certainly missed the mark. The effect is comic. The photographs are good. It teaches a moral lesson, but it is not a feature picture, in fact it is decidedly weak.

"BRADHURST FIELD CLUB" (Imp), April 8.—A picture of athletic sports. This includes a picture of John Hayes instructing the two runners who are to compete in the coming Marathon at the next Olympic Games. It is well photographed.

"THE SECTION FOREMAN" (Imp), April 8.—A dramatic railroad story of a foreman who had to choose between love and duty. He was on his way to the bedside of his wife, whom he supposed to be dying, and discovered a spread rail. He stopped and had it corrected. When he reached home, his wife was on the road to recovery. These two pictures together make a good release, a desirable filler.

"A MASHER OUTWITTED" (Eclair), April 7.—A picture made in France, with pretty girls and pretty scenes. It deals, in comedy vein, with high social life and its chief player is a viscount who is good looking and has a way with women. He is the masher. He was engaged to an American heiress, but flirted with the pretty flower girl who cleverly manages to "show him up." The backgrounds are beautiful and make some exquisite scenes. The situation is artistically handled; but while it pleases, its appeal is to the mind; it has no true heart interest. It is a cold-hearted picture.

"THE TORN LETTER" (Nestor), April 8.—The letter to the very pretty young wife was from her brother in hiding from justice, but claiming innocence. It was torn in half and her husband, who sees only one part, misunderstands. He makes her think that he has drowned himself. In a freshly thought-out story, the picture shows us how husband and brother, unknown to each other, meet and become partners and how the tangle in the situation is straightened out. Miss Dorothy Davenport plays the girl; Mr. H. Otto, the brother; and Mr. Lockwood, the husband. The sets and backgrounds are fine and the photography very good. It is a fair feature picture, commendably handled and interesting.

"THE NEW VILLAGE DOCTOR" (Powers), April 6.—The story is of the slightest, being mostly a series of comedy happenings which tell a little love story. There are pretty girls and sprightly doings in the picture, and it makes fair entertainment. A filler.

"UNCLE SAM'S BOYS ON THE MEXICAN BORDER" (Powers), April 6.—A picture of soldiers in Texas, pretty well photographed, and is very interesting. On the same reel with the above.

"THE MARGRAVE'S DAUGHTER" (Gaumont), April 6.—This beautifully tinted, two reel feature picture tells a romantic story of Germany in the days when steel headpiece and chain armor were in style. It is especially fine, a work of art and a thrilling love story. It is set in and around a beautiful moated castle and palace and is a feature to show when you want to make an effect on Saturday night or on some special occasion. It will repay boosting. Indeed, some special effort ought to be made to induce the public to see it; it will make friends for the moving pictures and will repay its advertisers. The Gaumont Company can do this kind of thing very well.

"THE CUB REPORTER'S BIG SCOOP" (Nestor), April 6.—A romantic picture of a cub reporter's adventure, getting an interview with a crusty old magnate. He gets acquainted in a romantic way, with this magnate's pretty daughter. The picture has the elements of popularity and will appeal strongly to the large unsophisticated body of spectators. It has very pretty backgrounds and is well photographed. We call it a popular feature; it is not a very artistic picture.

"GLIMPSES OF SOUTHERN FRANCE" (Great Northern), April 13.—These scenes were mostly taken from the window of a train, en route from one large city to another, names not given. The views are clear and the country interesting. Not enough detail is given for the picture to be truly instructive. It would have been better for more descriptive leaders.

"IN DRY TERRITORY" (Nestor), April 13.—A farce comedy set in a dry town where "tea," whether from China or from Kentucky, had to be served in the same kind of pot. The temperance committee, in parlor A, being ladies', ordered tea; their husbands, in Parlor B, engaged in a quiet game, ordered "tea." The orders got mixed. Neither this error nor its results really convince. There are things in it that will cause laughter in the gallery; and there are things that may offend sensitive spectators, especially those who have temperance at heart. It is a weak filler.

"OLD TOWN, ALBUQUERQUE" (Nestor), April 13.—This picture on the same reel is very well photographed. It is instructive and interesting.

"MR. SMITH, BARBER" (Imp), April 13.—Smith (Mr. Cumpson) is surprised by his wife having a jolly time at the Cosy Corner Cafe and taken home. The picture shows how he arranged to get away and how wifey got wise. It is a fair filler.

"A LEAP FOR LOVE" (Imp), April 13.—A youth, after telling a girl that he would jump from the Brooklyn Bridge for her, made a bet of $500 that he would do it and did it. It was done with a parachute into icy waters. Good views of the bridge are shown. The picture stands on this thrill; the story is not clear nor convincing. It is fairly well photographed.

"DRIFTWOOD" (Selig), April 9.—This very entertaining picture starts out as though it were going to be the real thing in melodrama; but—we almost wrote, unfortunately—becomes original. It is a story with two heroines. One is a virtuous "down and out" girl; the other an innocent, runaway daughter of a wealthy business man, whom the film states is "retired." Both girls look exactly alike. We see views of city life on a cold winter's night; the bread line, etc. The poor girl tries to get shelter by pretending that she is the girl, her double; but the parents recognize her as an imposter. The other girl is rescued by a worthy young man who is also down and out and all are happy in a well-made ending. We can't call it a feature; but we enjoyed it more than any other picture of the day that we have seen as yet. It is a desirable filler on its merits. The photographs are good enough.

Projection Department

Edited by F. H. RICHARDSON.

THE LONGEST THROW.—Ottumwa, Ia., writes: "We think a great deal of the Projection Department out in this neck of the woods. It has proven of great value, both to the operator and exhibitor. Will you kindly tell me what is the longest distance moving pictures have been projected?"

Glad to know you like the Department, Ottumwa. Trust it may continue to meet your approbation. The longest throw of which I have any knowledge, was at Young's Million Dollar Pier, Atlantic City, New Jersey, which same was burned down about a week ago. The distance was 212 feet from lens to screen. It is possible there has been a longer projection than this, but if so I do not know of it. The screen used was a "Mirror Screen." It had been my intention to go to Atlantic City this coming summer, on purpose to examine the lens combination of this throw, and try to ascerain if possible, what relative loss of light there was between the film and the lens. This, however, is out of the question now, since the pier has been burned down.

A VARIETY.—Mr. Philip Hayward, Dalton, Ga., writes: "Am using Powers Six, with two wing shutters, picture about 11 feet, at 72 feet; lens, about 6½ inches e. f.; condensers, both 6½; 102-volt D. C. current, using rheostat; have a very good home-made, aluminum-coated screen; use 6 x ⅝ Bio. carbons, soft-cored above and below. Seventeen amperes gives me a bright picture, but with once in a while a bad ghost in the center. This ghost does not appear all the time with this amperage, but every few days. I keep my spot so small that it requires constant watching to keep brown edges off the pictures. By hooking up two rheostats and using 35 amperes I have no ghost, but the picture is too bright, and the flicker gets painful, unless the machine is run so fast that it bursts the picture. My house is light enough to read a newspaper, while pictures are on. What will I do to remove the ghost without increasing amperage? I presume that the lenses are located properly in regard to their optical centers. Now about the gasoline and dynamo question: When I opened here I was compelled to make my own juice and bought a 6 h.p. engine (Olds) and Triumph 40-ampere, 125-volt dynamo. This was nine months ago; I have renewed two of the four brushes on the dynamo, but have never wiped off the commutator, following the rule that with D. C. apparatus, the best remedy is to keep your hands off. However, I daily use a bellows and blow away all the dust and dirt that I can. One trouble I have found: I carry 110 volts and, when I throw the arc on, it drops to about 100, or sometimes even less. This I take to be due to the setting of the brushes, which demand a different position for variations in the external resistance. The proposition of placing the field resistance in the operating room looks foolish to me, as the operator has something else to do besides watching it. I have now discarded the engine in favor of a motor, as juice is now for sale here, and it is a great satisfaction. My generator was compound wound and I still use it through a belt drive from the motor, although a direct connection is undoubtedly more efficient. I tried without success to run the generator at 50 volts using field resistance, and any man who can do it without tearing up his windings and rebuilding has it on me. Why in the name of sense don't you stop wasting space in your projection department on a lot of fool questions, and fill it up with good stuff like your last issue? There are a lot of operators just like myself, out in the woods, who don't know any more than we get from the World, and the more good dope you give us the better we like it. Just on a little scheme I am working, and you will raise thunder about it, too. I use an old fan motor, and drive off the flywheel, using an old reel band for a belt, which gives just enough to allow proper framing. Why not drive off the flywheel?"

The "ghost" is very likely nothing more or less than the shadow of the lower carbon-tip. The fact that it only shows up once in a while is probably due to some little variation in the set of the carbons. Plainly, it is not due to the lens system, else it would be present all the time. I would suggest ⅝-cored carbons above, and ⅜ solid carbons below. I would advise that you try this. I think you will get better results that way, if you propose using that low an amperage. Suppose you try the matter out and report. However, you will probably have to have your exchange order the small, solid carbons especially for you. I think, however, that will cure the "ghost" business. The drop in voltage might be due to the cause you suggest, but I would rather suppose it to be the result of a slight slacking in speed of your engine or motor, when the arc-load is thrown on. My dear sir, those questions which to you sound foolish, are by no manner of means foolish to the ones who ask them. If you will look back over the Projection Department for the past two years, I believe you will find that the "foolish question" proposition is becoming less and less in evidence, though, of course, some very simple queries are still propounded, and no doubt will be for a good while to come. I hope, however, that within another two years the incompetent operator will be practically eliminated from the field. Then the "fool question" will also be eliminated. You must remember, however, that until this department and the Handbook were instituted, there was absolutely nothing under one cover the operator could obtain to study. Electrical knowledge suitable to his purposes was not only scattered through many books, but was also in such technical form that it was practically of no value to him whatever. Please understand this is not in the nature of a boast, but a mere statement of fact which every one knows to be true. Taking these things into consideration, it is rather wonderful we have made the progress we have in knowledge of projection. As to the matter of belting a motor drive to the flywheel, the trouble with that proposition is simply this, the flywheel runs at high speed. It has in itself considerable weight. The bearing on the flywheel end of the flywheel shaft is subjected to the greatest wear of any one bearing of the machine. If, in addition to this, you add the pull of a motor belt, it tends to wear this bearing out very rapidly; a lost motion at that particular point, especially with some machines, is not at all good.

EXCELLENT FILM CEMENT.—Mr. B. J. Stern, New York City, writes: "Enclosed find sample of film cement and copyrighted label. I wish to put the cement on the market, but would first like to have the same criticised by yourself. Have disposed of several samples to different men, well versed in the art, and have received various criticisms. One says, there is too much of one thing, and another says, there is too much of another thing. I have, therefore, decided that the only way is to write to you, and ask your advice, as I wish to correct any flaw the cement may contain."

The copyrighted label names the cement as the "B. J. S. Electric film Cement." I am not an expert in the matter of the making of film cement. However, I believe I know a good cement when I try it. I have given your cement a personal test on both ordinary and N. I. film. I find that on either stock it makes a smooth, strong, and pliable patch; and that is enough for me. I do not care whether it is too much of this, or too little of that, as long as it makes the right kind of mend in the film, which the bottle you sent me certainly does. Of late there has been much difficulty in securing really good cement. I, therefore, welcome your product, providing it holds up to the sample. I would, however, suggest a different bottle. Something squatty, that will not upset as easily as will that tall bottle.

LICENSE.—Princeton, N. J., wants to know where to go to get a New York license; also cost of joining the New York Local.

To secure a New York license, you should make application to the Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity, 17th floor of the Park Row Building. The initiation fee to the New York Local is $5. Their office is 133 Third Avenue, near 14th Street. As regards the six months' law, of which you speak, I have not "stuck up for it" at all. In fact, I do not believe in it. But whether I believe in it or not is neither here nor there. It is at present the l-a-w, and that settles it.

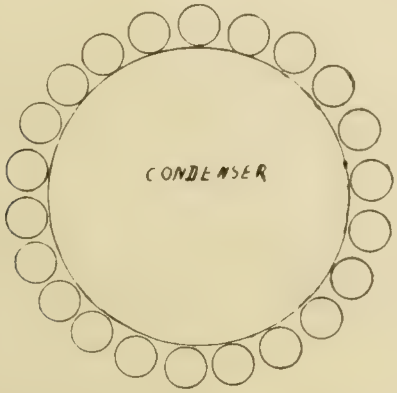
SOMEWHAT TECHNICAL.—Indiana (name of town suppressed) writes: "If the following line of reasoning is correct, and I have every reason to believe it is, the results given by Mr. Frank J. Martin in the March 23d issue of the department, are possible in that an arc can be run directly, without line resistance, from a 110-225 volt generator, by varying field excitation of the generator, and with connections as shown in his illustration; but it is inefficient because the effect obtained by using long leads to increase field resistance could be much better obtained by installing a field rheostat of less flexibility in series with leads directly connected to the brushes. First—Let us assume that there is an increase in line current; from the fundamental equation, $I = E \div R$, or $E = IR$, where I equals line current and R equals line resistance, it will be noted that the voltage drop increases as the load current increases, the voltage applicable for field excitation is therefore less, and from the same equation as above, the field exciting current is less. From the primary action of a generator we know that voltage is generated by conductors on the armature cutting lines of force or flux, from the fields. This flux or Φ is equal to $.4 \times 3.14 \times S \times I$, where I is exciting current and S is the number of turns around one field pole. S remains constant and, as we have shown that I becomes less, it is therefore obvious that Φ becomes less, and the generated output voltage becomes less. To regain normal voltage the resistance in the rheostat must be decreased by an increased amount proportional to the IR drop in the load wires. This, therefore, necessitates a rheostat of greater flexibility to obtain the same results as can be obtained with field leads taken directly from brushes. Load IR drop is therefore entirely done away with. I may have made an error in this line of reasoning, somewhere, and, if so, would like to be corrected. It may be well to add that I tried operating a 4.5 K. W. 110-115 volt generator on a rough, home-made lamp, at 18 and 25 volts, across the arc, with both shunt and compound field connections. With 45 amperes I was able to obtain a brilliant and intense arc. The tests were started in each case with an open circuit voltage of 50 volts, and upon making the arc the voltage dropped to 25 volts across the arc with compound connections and 18 volts with shunt connections. These tests were unsatisfactory in that I was compelled to bring my current up by cutting out resistance in the line which I found necessary to install in order to prevent the sudden load from throwing the belt off the badly lined pulleys of the generator and driving motor. I hope to obtain some better results as soon as I have time to re-align my machines and secure a better test lamp."

I imagine that while your letter will be very interesting to some of our readers, it will, to the great majority, be a cross between Sanscrit and ancient Egyptian. As for the editor, he read about half of it, then climbed a tree and looked down. Seriously, I was, however, able to follow the matter through myself, all right, fairly well; though I do not feel competent to check up that kind of dope. I would caution writers that matter for the department should be made as simple as you can possibly express it. It must be remembered that the great majority of our readers are not well posted in theoretical electrical science, and have never had experience to any extent in the use of formulas. I shall turn this matter over, I think, to those of our readers who are well posted in such matters. I must, however, maintain my position that I do not believe it practicable to produce 45-volt current with a generator designed for 110 volts. Perhaps I am wrong. If so, I shall be glad to be shown. We shall be glad to have reports of your further experiments, but put it in as simple language as you possibly can.

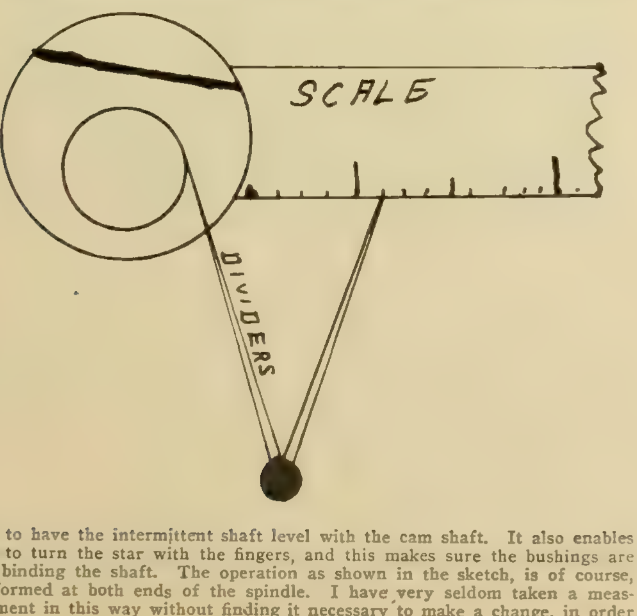
NOT AN OPERATOR.—Brooklyn, N. Y., writes, saying that, while he is not an operator, and never expects to be, yet he is one of our constant readers, and wants to know: (1) What is the difference between a rheostat and an Inductor; (2) Using a 110-volt, 25-ampere, fixed rheostat, what voltage do you get at the arc; (3) Using two 110-volt, 25-ampere, rheostats in series of 220 volt D. C., what voltage do you get at the arc; (4) If an Inductor is used on 220-volt A. C., 35 amperes, what voltage do you get at the arc?

A rheostat is a metallic resistance which breaks down the voltage by dissipating the difference between the line and arc voltage in heat. An "Inductor" is simply a low voltage transformer, which takes a certain number of watts from the line, at a given voltage, and, by induction, delivers it on the secondary, or arc line circuit, at the arc voltage, without any considerable waste. (2, 3 and 4), the projection arc is at its best when at a pressure of about 35 volts, A. C., or between 45 and 55 D. C. In practice, the arc is kept at such length that the voltage falls within these figures. If it is kept at any other length (the arc voltage will depend upon the length of the arc to a considerable extent), the light will not be good.

CONDENSER BREAKAGE.—St. Catharines, Ontario, writes: "Having secured much valuable information from the Department, I have wished to contribute something myself. I first wanted, however, to be sure I had something of value to offer. I notice many operators having the old condenser breakage trouble, for which I believe I have at last secured a real remedy, in most cases, anyhow. When I came here some ten months ago, I found one of the worst cases of condenser breakage I ever had the misfortune to buck. I had tried baking, boiling, grinding and everything I ever heard of, all to no purpose. In looking over your Handbook, the article on the lamp house set me thinking. The result of my deliberation was, that it seemed to me if some way could be found to ventilate the back condenser, it would stop the breakage. I, therefore, devised the following plan, which has been a success, at least in my case, and I do not think a worse case of condenser breakage ever happened. Now I never have one break at all.



"I cut holes around the back through the lamp house, around the back condenser lens, as illustrated in sketch. These I covered with wire gauze, to keep sparks from getting out. I think there is no doubt of the real value of this scheme, at least to any one using the old style round condenser mount. And now here is another one which has given me good results. I am satisfied, operators in many cases would get steadier pictures and better results all around, if they would stop making their star and Geneva adjustment by guess, making them, instead, by measurement. The following applies to the Edison machine: First take off the side bar casting, which holds the main driving gear. Then remove the balance wheel, cam and cam shaft, first setting the star and Geneva as nearly correct as they can be set by the eye; next take a small machinist's scale (rule), and a pair of dividers and measure as per diagram. In this way you are certain to have the intermittent shaft level with the cam shaft. It also enables you to turn the star with the fingers, and this makes sure the bushings are not binding the shaft. The operation as shown in the sketch, is of course, performed at both ends of the spindle. I have very seldom taken a measurement in this way without finding it necessary to make a change, in order to level up my intermittent sprocket shaft; all of which shows how unreliable the eye is when it comes to make an adjustment of this kind. I have tried Brother Gregory's plan of soaking carbons in brine. I use Bio carbons and find that it gives a nice soft, white light. The only drawback is a tendency of the carbons to needle after running two or three reels. In closing, let me say that projection here is very good indeed; much better than in some of the larger cities."



As regards the condenser scheme: I do not like to pass judgment on it without a rather complete, practical test. At first glance it does not seem of much value; but still one cannot most always sometimes tell. I, myself, had an idea at one time that if an open air space 4½ inches wide by ½ inch deep be provided, open at top and bottom and a thin sheet of annealed glass be set in the inner wall of the shute, thus covering the condenser, it would stop the breakage. But the fly in this particular box of ointment is that it proved to be practically impossible to secure uniformly reliable annealed glass; therefore, it was never tried out. As to the scheme for setting the intermittent shaft, I have repeatedly called attention to the importance of having the intermittent sprocket shaft set absolutely at right angles to the film. Unless this is done, the greater portion of the strain on the sprocket holes comes on one side of the film only. The scheme which you present is practical, provided always that the bushings be both worn the same amount. If, however, one bushing was worn more than the other, it would not work; also if the shaft were smaller at one end than the other, then due allowance of one-half the difference in the diameter would have to be made in order to bring the result out right. We thank you cordially for submitting these schemes and pass them on to our readers for their consideration.

GOOD WORK.—Indiana (name of town suppressed) writes: "In a recent issue, Tucson, Ariz., says he has run four months without a shut-down. That may be some record out there, but I have an operator who has run 18 months without a shut-down, and only one stop of four minutes during that time. He has been with me three years and a half. He gets any supplies needed in the operating room, and no questions asked. This house has the reputation of putting on the best pictures in the city, and we do the largest business, too. Seating capacity, 810."

Eighteen months without a shut-down is very excellent, indeed, so excellent that there would necessarily have to be considerable good luck mixed up in the performance. It would seem that in that length of time something would happen, no matter how careful a man might be; though, to be sure, if a man can run 5 months without a shut-down, as I myself once did, I suppose there really isn't any reason why he could not run three times five months. I do not quite understand. You say he ran 18 months without a shut-down, but he had to stop for four minutes once? A four-minute stop amounts to a shut-down with an audience.

CONDENSERS.—Galveston, Texas, orders a Handbook, and says: "I suppose the subject of condenser breakage has been discussed so often that you would willingly see it embalmed, and safely laid to rest. However, I shall bother you just once more on this subject. I had broken a great many lenses, during my short career as operator. Being of a curious turn of mind, I tried to solve the problem of the cause of their breakage. In this, I have been to a certain degree successful. By careful and constant observation, I noticed that when a condenser breaks the crack always starts at some slight imperfection on the bevel edge of the lens. Therefore, it follows that the best remedy is to remove the cause. I had an optician grind the lenses to a round edge, instead of the customary bevel. I also had him polish the edges as highly as the face of the lens itself is polished. This eliminated any chipped places, or imperfections, so common in the edges of the ordinary condenser lens. Two and a half years of use, under all kinds of trying conditions, has not broken these lenses. They are still in the ring, and apparently are there to stay. If you are skeptical about this, the cost is small and you can have a pair of lenses treated thus, and give them a severe test. We believe they will make good."

I do not know what to think about your scheme, Galveston; but I do not really believe I would want to use a pair of lenses 2½ years. Surely, in that time, the surface of at least the back lens would become very much roughened; particularly if you are using anything like a heavy amperage. However, if your scheme will stop breakage it certainly would be of great value, and it would not cost very much to give it a trial, anyhow. I must dispute you in one particular; it may be possible that, where the crack starts from the outer edge, it begins with an imperfection in the glass. That sounds reasonable. However, I have known of a lens starting to crack in its center. Explain that, if you can.

DENATURED ALCOHOL.—Georgia (name of town suppressed), writes, saying that Georgia is a "dry" state, and alcohol is not always easy to get; especially in small towns; wants to know if denatured alsohol, or sulphuric ether would do for cleaning lenses.

Denatured alcohol is just as good as any other kind for cleaning lenses. As to sulphuric ether, I do not know. It may be all right. I have never tried it.

POWERS' INDUCTOR.—Jersey City, N. J., writes: "Will you kindly answer the following: (1) How many watts, or K. W., does an automatic arc lamp consume per hour, when same is pulling 12 amperes on 110-volt A. C.? I wish to know the cost of current consumption. (2) With the Powers' 220-volt inductor, having three contacts and a maximum capacity of 60 amperes, what are the three amperages and their relative voltage at the arc; also their relative consumption from the line?"

(1) It would depend on the power factor. I cannot answer without knowing that.

(2) About 45, 55 and 60 amperes, though this varies somewhat with different inductors. The arc voltage is practically constant at 35 on all three contacts. From 12½ to 16 amperes are taken from the line, according to whether the low or high contact is used.

FOCAL LENGTH.—Chicago, Ill., writes: "Kindly give the rule for determining the focal length of condensing lenses for any given throw."

I wish I knew some rule myself, Chicago, but unfortunately there seems to be none. Anyhow you could not figure on the throw, unless you kept the size of the picture the same all the time. You can only figure a certain condenser combination for a given focal length of projection lens, and it does not always work out. Generally speaking, if you have less than a three-inch e.f. projection lens, use two 6½ condensers. If your projection lenses are between 3 and 4-inch e.f., use one 6½ and one 7½; if more than 4-inch, use two 7½. But, as I said, this does not always work out.

QUEER PROPOSITION.—Sioux City, Ia., writes: "I have been operating for four years, and have had a great variety of troubles, but nothing like the difficulty I am now confronted with. I am running an Edison machine, and have a 30-ampere, 110-volt rheostat, on D. C. While I am running the pictures this rheostat sings as if it were on 60-cycle A. C., instead of D. C. When I run the spot light it acts the same, and the spot has the somewhat same appearance as an A. C. spot has at the aperture. When I run the song slides the rheostat is quiet, as it should be. I certainly like the Projection Department, although I am not a subscriber. I get it at a newsstand every week. When I first came here no one was taking the World. I got a dealer to order it for me. He got five, and very soon I had to fight to get mine. He now saves me one every week."

As to that rheostat proposition, Sioux City, I am up in a tall tree looking down. It seems to be a very discriminating instrument, preferring only to work on song slides. If any of our readers have had a similar experience, for heaven's sake tell us about it. I would suggest that you subscribe by the year. It is much more satisfactory to the publisher, and I should suppose would be just as good or better for you.

EMBRYO OPERATOR.—Illinois (name of town suppressed by request), writes: "Will you kindly answer the following questions: (a) What are the requirements for an operator in a small town of 1,500 in Illinois? (b) Is there any law forbidding a boy of 16 to operate a moving picture machine in Illinois?"

(a) The requirements for an operator in a small town are the same as the requirements for an operator in a large city—with this difference; in a large city the operator is usually given an examination, and must at least prove that he knows a lamp-house from a stack of hay before he can take charge of an operating room, whereas in the small town there are usually no such tests required. An operator should know something of optics, as applied to lenses; he should have a very good working knowledge of electricity and electrical action; he should have a good knowledge of the electric arc, and its action; he should have a good knowledge of the projection machine, and its theory. and a fairly good working knowledge of mechanics, as well as some other things; and when he knows all these things, he should, in addition, be equipped with an abundant supply of what we term "horse sense." (b) There is no law that I know of forbidding a 16-year-old boy, or a boy 8 years old for that matter, from operating a moving picture machine, in the state of Illinois, except in its cities, where the matter is dealt with locally. However, there should be such a law, and it should be strictly enforced. A boy 16 years old has not the necessary judgment to handle a projection machine, in which the rays of a powerful arc light are concentrated on such a highly inflammable substance as celluloid. More than this, he is not likely to have the requisite knowledge of electricity, optics, etc., and beside all this, a 16-year-old boy ought to be in school.

LIGHT BILL EXCESSIVE.—Salem, Ind., writes: "I have a Model B Edison, one-pin machine. Use 35 to 40 amperes of 110-volt current on a 45-foot throw, projecting an 11-foot picture. Formerly, when I was running the same number of reels per show, and the same number of shows per day, the light bill was $12 to $14 per month. I have made no changes at all; now it is from $20 to $25 per month, and the light is very bad. When I first strike the arc there is a fine light. This continues for two or three minutes, then the arc begins to diminish, and goes out, all but a little at the point of the carbon. The light then, of course, is very dim. We then touch the carbons and separate them about ¼-inch, and the light is again good for a minute or two, but there is nearly always a dim spot in the center of the screen, which is never bright and clear as it used to be. I am figuring on moving my screen back 10 feet. Can I do this and get a good picture with the present lens? What causes the arc to run around the carbons; high voltage, or low; or is it the amperage? Please answer these questions at once. I wrote you before, but you did not answer my inquiry."

Your letter is addressed simply to the Moving Picture World, as most likely your former one also was. Letters intended for the Projection Department should be addressed to the Moving Picture World, Projection Department. It must be remembered there is a great mass of mail coming in every day, and when letters intended for a department are simply addressed to the paper in general they may get mislaid. Letters addressed to the Projection Department are placed in my desk, without being opened, and I am, therefore, certain to get them. You are not definite enough in regards to current proposition. You have not said whether your current was A. C. or D. C., and you have not said whether the bill you speak of includes incandescent lights, as well as the arc light, and, if so, how many incandescent and what candle power? You have not given the approximate number of hours your house is lighted each day. However, assuming that you run only six days a week, and that the bill includes all incandescent light, and your arc lamp current is taken through a rheostat, I would not call a dollar a day excessive. Give me further information, and I can then form a more intelligent opinion. As to the dying down of the light after one or two minutes, I am inclined to think that this is due to poor and dirty connections, and old wires. Begin at your main house switch and take all connections apart, and clean them thoroughly, sandpapering them until they are bright. Clean out the inside of the carbon-jaws of your lamp with a file. If the asbestos covered lamp leads get warm, get some new ones. In any event, cut off that portion which is inside the lamp house, as it is very likely charred and burned. If this does not remedy the difficulty, please notify me, and I will consider the matter further. As to the arc running around the carbons, that sounds like you were using solid carbons above. If you are using D. C., 35 to 40 amperes, use ⅝-cored carbons above and ½-inch solid below. Do not use the arc light carbons, such as light companies use, but regular projection carbons, such as you obtain from your film exchange. Carbons used by light companies are too hard. If you are using A. C., use ⅝ cored, both above and below. Yes, you can get as good a picture with your present lens, at 55, as you can at 45; but it will be about 30 inches wider.

IMPOSSIBLE.—Galesburg, Ill., writes and encloses a two cent stamp, requesting information that would require an hour of my own time, and that much time of a stenographer. If Galesburg were the only one, we might accommodate him, though the request is unreasonable. When we consider, however, that these requests for personal replies are very numerous, the impossibility of replying to such letters, except that remuneration for the time consumed be enclosed, is obvious. If Galesburg wishes me to reply through the department, well and good; that costs him nothing. We are glad to serve him in that way. If, however, he wants us to take time to answer his queries, personally, let him enclose two or three dollars and we will go into the matter.

STEREO LENS.—Jamaica, L. I., writes, saying: "I have a Power's Six on a 75-foot throw. I can not get my stereo lens in proper focus. In order to center light on screen, I have to push lens too far away to one side of machine and the light will then not strike the lens when the lamp house is all the way over. Cannot the lens be fixed so that the light will center on it when the lamp house is all the way over."

Your description, Jamaica, is not very clear. I believe, however, I understand what you are driving at. The bars, or bracket through the end of which the stereo lens rod passes is held at its slotted end on an upright casting. Loosen the screw which holds this casting to the upright rod and swing the lens a little. I think this will overcome your difficulty; if it does not, write me again and I will go into the matter further.

POWER'S SIX TROUBLE.—Indianapolis, Ind., writes: "I am a member of local Number 194, I. A. T. S. E., therefore I address you as brother. In April 6th edition of The World, you seem to have failed to understand the trouble of our brother at Crossett, Ark., as regards his torn film. The thing probably never happened to you, or you would have understood it readily. It is present in all Power's Sixes until remedied. If I am correct, the film tears in a straight line, just inside the line of sprocket holes. You will find the cause for this in the apron of the machine, where the narrow tongue begins the bend to fit between the rims of the intermittent sprocket. The raised track on either side of the apron ends just so as to clear the sprocket teeth. A loose patch or a small tear will catch on this usually, and tear out a thin strip. The tear continues until the machine is stopped. The remedy is to remove the apron and bend the end of the track back just a very little with the plyers."

We have carefully examined the point you have raised, Indianapolis, and find that (a) only on very few machines does the film touch the apron at all at that point; (b) that the apron is quite thick and curved back slightly where the raised track ends; (c) that it would hardly and could hardly split the film as you describe except the apron be very much worn at that point, a thing which would never occur with most machines. No; I think you are somewhat in error this time, Indianapolis, admitting the thing to be possible on an occasional machine, in which case your remedy is correct.

THE QUESTION OF THROW.—Colorado Springs, Colo., writes: "Would the difference in results be sufficient to warrant swinging the film house from the ceiling at 60 feet, or having it at 100 feet on the balcony, the screen being 19 feet wide."

Apparently you seem to think a better picture would be had at 60 ft. In this you are in error. The exact opposite is the fact. The 100 foot throw will be better than the 60. We would advise you to set your operating room in the balcony, unless there are other reasons for swinging it from the ceiling. I had to smile when I read your letter. I have heard the operating room called a "booth," "cage," "coop," and other similar terms, but "film house" is something else again.

COMPARISONS.—Watertown, N. Y., asks me to say which is the best, the Gundlach or the Bausch and Lomb Zeiss Tusar 11 bf:6.3.

For obvious reasons, we cannot make comparisons of this kind in the Department.

BLANK CARTRIDGE INJURES PLAYER.

Mr. Francis X. Bushman, the well-known and popular leading man of the Essanay Eastern Stock Company, was painfully injured last week during the rehearsal of a thrilling detective drama soon to be released. The accident occurred during the preliminary rehearsal of a sensational scene in which a raid is made on a counterfeiter's den by secret service men. A struggle ensues and a revolver battle, in which the gang is worsted, climaxes the scene. Mr. Bushman was leading the detectives into the den, and, at the point where the revolvers are discharged, became engaged in a hand-to-hand encounter with the chief of the counterfeiters, armed with a heavy calibre gun. The weapon was accidentally fired and Mr. Bushman received the wadding from the blank cartridge in the fleshy part of his left arm, making an extremely deep and painful wound. The injury was quickly dressed and the director was on the point of calling off the rehearsal for the day, but Bushman pluckily refused to stop work, the climax of the scene was changed so as to eliminate the revolver battle, and the film terminated in a highly successful and satisfactory capture of the counterfeiters. A physician was then hastily summoned, Bushman's injury was properly dressed, and he left for home to rest up and recover from the nervous shock.

MISS BERTRAM ILL.

Miss Vedah Bertram, one of the leading ladies of the Essanay Western Stock Company at Lakeside, Cal., has been confined in the hospital for several weeks suffering from a severe illness. Miss Bertram, although having appeared in but few films so far, has won a warm place in the hearts of film-lovers for her talent and beauty, and hope for her speedy recovery is universally extended.

NEW "PASTIME" AT WINCHESTER, KY.

The Pastime Theater, the new picture theater at Winchester, Ky., opened Thursday, April 4. It has a seating capacity of 333 persons and is well lighted and ventilated. An orchestra of five pieces provides music for the pictures. Arthur N. and Clarence Bloomfield are the managers. A ten-cent admission is charged.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"THE AVERTED STEP" (Republic).

A bit of melodrama on the line of "why girls go wrong" has been woven into a picture play and produced by the Republic for release April 23, only in this case the girl did not go wrong, being saved from a rash step by a dream. Hence the title "The Averted Step." According to the story, Nell, an operator in a "sweat shop," has an offer of marriage from her employer. She can't decide at first, but the picture makes it plain that love of luxury induces her to accept the offer and the wedding takes place. Nell's husband is a serious business man and devotes most of his time to his business to the neglect of his pretty wife.

Womanlike, she does not like to be neglected, even for business, and seeks pleasure with others. She visits a girl friend and there sees the photograph of a very handsome young man. While she is looking at the picture the man comes into the room. His appearance and manner makes a deep impression on Nell, and she takes the photograph home with her.

Scene from "The Averted Step" (Republic).

Upon reaching home Nell receives a message from her husband telling her that he will not be home for dinner as he has a very important business deal on hand. This further annoys Nell, and turns her mind to the young man whose photograph she has. Taking the picture she drops into an easy chair and falls asleep, while contemplating it. In her dream the young man calls, and, by his hypnotic influence, compels her to submit to his embraces. In the meantime the husband comes home and, discovering the situation, secures a revolver and shoots the intruder. At the shot the young man turns into a representation of the Devil and Nell wakes up.

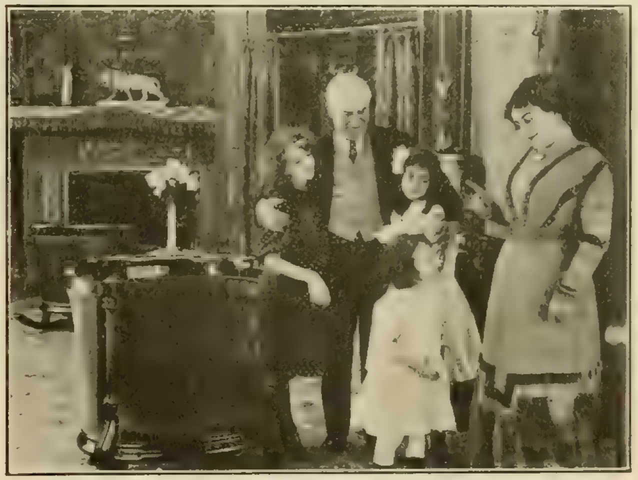
While Nell has been having her awful dream her husband has succeeded in completing his business deal and returns home to tell his wife of his success and to tell her of a trip abroad which his hard labor has earned. Nell now realizes that her husband's love is the best thing on earth for her, and is glad that she did not take the contemplated step in search of pleasure.

The Republic players have carried their respective parts well in this picture and there are a number of excellent lighting effects in some of the scenes. It is a picture that will entertain.

"HIS LOVE OF CHILDREN" (Reliance).

"His Love of Children" tells a pretty story which will be understood by everybody, particularly the children. Old John Hedden was a wealthy old bachelor who loved children very much. He called frequently at the home of a widow who had three happy children, and at their house he passed many pleasant evenings, romping with the youngsters. It was supposed that he was in love with the mother of the children, but such a thing must have been far from his mind, because he married the young governess of the children, much to the surprise of all, but particularly to the sorrow of the youngsters, who lost thereby a good governess and an old friend.

The governess did not make as good a wife as old John Hedden had supposed she would. She had gotten the society craze, and before long was deeply involved in the affairs of a certain social set, with bridge-whist as one of the principal attractions. The old man was disappointed. He was no longer allowed by his wife to call upon the widow and her children, and at the same time his wife was not often at home; therefore he became lonely.



Scene from "His Love of Children" (Reliance).

One day he took the widow and her family out to the zoo, and while there a friend (?) of his wife's saw him with the other family and reported instantly to Mrs. Hedden. Straightway the selfish wife went to the home of the widow with trouble in her eye and mien. She made some fuss upon entering and accused the widow of stealing her husband, which was an unreasonable accusation, because old Hedden had already made his choice between the widow and the wife. Going to a door, the widow threw it open and disclosed old Hedden and the three children, happy in each other's presence, as in the days gone by. The scene points out to the selfish wife the error of her ways, and she sees it.

This story is charmingly told and has a pleasing interest throughout. The scenes at the zoo are more than pleasing. Some of the large bears are put through their paces in a way that is highly entertaining. The scenario was written by Mr. George W. Terwilliger, and produced by Mr. James Kirkwood.

"TRUE 'TILL DEATH" (Melies).

It is not often that Melies feature or "boost" a film, but when they do, it can well be taken for granted that the subject is a deserving one. The film that has this time called forth special advertising from this firm is entitled, "True 'Till Death," to be released upon Thursday, April 25th, 1912.

The story is laid in the period of the Civil War. Phillip and Paul are friendly rivals for the hand of Elizabeth Blake, and her selection of Paul results in a union most happy, soon blessed with the arrival of a baby girl. The call to arms for the Civil War separates Paul from his young wife and child forever, for in the raging of battle a bullet penetrates his breast and he dies in the arms of his old friend and rival, Phillip; and Phillip carries the sad news to Elizabeth.

Scene from "True Till Death" (Melies).

The smoke of battle had not been seen for twenty-five years when Phillip again proposes to Elizabeth only to be refused for the second time because Elizabeth's love for Paul had proved undying.

In that interval Elizabeth's daughter had died, leaving a son who now came before his grandmother requesting a costume for a mask ball. She took out the old garments she and Paul had worn at their first ball and the lad and his sweetheart, in these outfits, bring back to Elizabeth memories of those by-gone days that had been so sweet.

She sees the vision of Paul once again leading her gracefully over the dance hall and in that vision death overcomes her.

The scenery is exceptionally commendable and the entire subject one fully worthy of all the special advertising efforts the firm of Melies are expending.

"A TANGLED WEB" (Rex).

Our good friend, Othello, once remarked, "Trifles light as air to jealous eyes, are true as words of Holy Writ." It is not the strangest thing in the world that a lonely and neglected wife should seek to find some slight relief from the dreariness of self-amusement. Many of them do. Some of them overstep the bounds of propriety. Some of them go to perdition; while again there are others who hover on the brink, but who are saved by prudence. Husbands who neglect their wives should not expect their course to be free from consequences. When circumstances precipitate the effects of neglect, an unreasonable husband usually puts all the blame upon the wife and sees none in himself. In the majority of cases matters at first are not beyond repair. Where a woman is trembling on the brink, the slightest touch will send her over, or the slightest touch will pull her back.

Such a proposition we have in "A Tangled Web." The wife was left alone and did her best to amuse herself in an innocent way. The tempter came across her path in a remote rural spot, where no one would expect a tempter to be knocking about. Fortunately, the tempter cared more about money than he did about women; so, after a few letters had passed between himself and the deluded wife, he began to importune for money, using the letters as his leverage. She pawned jewelry and other valuables to meet his voracious demands. Finally the truth came out, as it usually does in such cases, and the husband became fully aware. Without taking any of the blame to himself, he proceeded to denounce his wife a very terrible creature and prepared to depart. The wife was guiltless of anything more than a neurasthenic indiscretion. This was proved to the satisfaction of the husband by the self-sacrifice of the wife's lady companion. The husband found out at last what he might have ascertained at first had he been sufficiently self-possessed to have made a cool-headed investigation.

The idea of the story is best summed up in the moral, which follows the picture in printed fashion, like the moral of a book:

"Oh! What a tangled web we weave,
When first we practice to deceive."

"THE RETURN OF LIFE" (Majestic).

What we see in this picture story is something that doctors have been preaching to business men for years; a new mode of life. Every day sick business men are advised by physicians to give up everything in the way of business and seek a new existence. But few men follow that advice, and consequently they die. In this instance, however, we have the case of a man who heeded the advice of his physician and cured himself without medicine.

He was a lawyer. Overwork had brought him to the breaking point. He collapsed one day in his office and the family physician told him that the only way to get well was to have a complete change of affairs. The lawyer had received a pretty good scare and followed this final advice. While laboriously returning home from the office he dropped a wallet that was found by an Italian girl of very humble position. Her family was very poor and she had a brother who refused to work, but the Italian girl insisted on returning the money. The wallet would not fit in the envelope and the girl wrote its owner to that effect.

Scene from "The Return of Life" (Majestic).

Having no particular business on hand, the lawyer visited the home of the Italian girl and there found a new interest. He had an opportunity to observe the humble home and he became interested in the Italian maiden. Returning home he shaved off his beard and put on the garb of a working man. He got a job shoveling with a contractor's gang. He also rented a room at the home of Tessa, the Italian girl. The lawyer lived this life for some length of time. Meantime there developed a mutual admiration between himself and Tessa. One day, however, the girl's father was brought home injured and from that time on ceased to be a bread winner. That made things bad for the family, but the lawyer undertook to provide for them.

Returning from work, shortly afterward, the lawyer met the old physician who had prescribed the new life for him. His heart was filled with joy because he had really found a new life. Not only had he regained his health, but he found a woman who had interested him far more than those of his own social set had formerly done. He took the doctor to his humble abode and put him to work on the old man. When the old man was well the lawyer decided that they might as well all move to better quarters, inasmuch as he and Tessa were about to be married, which, of course, they were.

The picture becomes more and more interesting as it unfolds. At first it seems a trifle improbable, but there are good reasons for that.

"HER MOUNTAIN HOME" (American).

Ralph Kennington, dying of thirst in the alkali dust of the desert, staggered forward until exhaustion sprawled him flat on his face. Instinctively his hand clutched at the pebbles, when, lo! to his astonished gaze a dull yellow glow announced the magic word, "Gold!" An hour later James Raleigh found him there with the nugget tightly clasped in his hand. The long-desired bonanza had been finally discovered. The little mining town became the scene of the utmost activity.

Ralph Kennington, recovered, had gone to live with his new-found pal, Jim Raleigh. The two became fast friends and were the first to hurry back to the gold field.

Among those who joined that first mad rush was old man Hadley and his pretty daughter Marguerite. Years of unsuccessful mining had greatly impoverished his fortunes and health, so when at last he found his claim rich beyond his dreams, the poor old miner's heart gave way, leaving pretty Marguerite without a protector.

Scene from "Her Mountain Home" (American).

Ralph and James took her in and for some months everything moved smoothly. Both men fell deeply in love with their young housekeeper. James made love to her in his bold way, pleading that she run away with him. But Ralph pursued different methods. Without saying a word to anyone of his intentions, Ralph built on the mountainside a magnificent home, biding his time until it should be finished, when he would ask her to be its mistress.

Jim made better headway. The two planned an elopement and left suddenly one day with only a little note to explain their disappearance. Ralph found it. Heartbroken he strolled aimlessly to town. In the meantime the eloping couple stopped at a neighboring store before boarding the stage for their journey. Marguerite went inside while Jim waited. When she again emerged her horror-stricken eyes saw Jim tightly clasping the form of a strange young woman who evidently had just reached town from the East. Jim had no thought of Marguerite. With his former love he sauntered carelessly down the street.

Then Ralph appeared, and, taking in the situation at a glance, put his arm about the tearful Marguerite and led her to the new home on the mountainside.

ANIMATED WEEKLY REPRESENTED EVERYWHERE.

Within the past two weeks over one hundred camera men have been placed in different points throughout the world, representing the Sales Company Animated Weekly. This covers every point on the globe and carries out the catch line in the advertising that "Wherever there's sunlight and wherever there's humanity, the Animated Weekly is there for you."

The new posters have created a furore of most favorable comment and with the other publicity features contemplated by the management of the Animated Weekly, it bids fair to become the most famous film in the world. Exhibitors are requested to write the Sales Company for novel ideas that will assist them in making the weekly what it is destined to be: the topical reel of the hour and the most talked-of film on the globe. There are cuts and press matter: and material is being prepared for free distribution that will get money into the box office.

"THE LOAN SHARK" (Imp).

The attention of the public, both in New York and Chicago, has recently been directed towards the malfeasances of the loan shark. The usurer of all ages of civilization has been an object of public hatred. He has used the poverty of his victim as a means for extorting tremendous rates of interest; the result being much unhappiness amongst the ignorant poor.

In this story we are shown the difficulty of an old clerk who is compelled to raise money from a loan shark, whose factotum, a woman, is especially merciless and severe, insisting upon the pound of flesh stipulated for. The old clerk is driven to steal money in order to pay his instalment.

The loan shark's daughter meets with an accident and the old clerk's daughter's fiance, a young surgeon, is instrumental in saving the girl's life. The surgeon, who discovers by chance the financial condition of the old man, and his transactions with the loan shark, demands in payment of his services that the loan shark relinquish all claims on his victim. With the papers in his possession the doctor reaches the home of the old clerk in time to save his life, and that of the old fellow's daughter. For the poor, harassed clerk, groaning under the weight of his debt, contemplated self-destruction and the murder of his daughter as the means of ending his troubles.

Scene from "The Loan Shark" (Imp).

Rolinda Bainbridge is disagreeably aggressive as the loan shark's secretary; the part of the young doctor is played by King Baggot, and Grace Lewis is his fiancée. William Shay plays the loan shark.

The story is neatly and cleverly constructed and should achieve its object of directing attention to the dangers which ignorant people may run into in their dealings with money lenders.

As a matter of fact, some cities are adopting a fixed rate of interest so that the demands of the loan shark will be limited in the future. April 25 is the release date.

NEW MACHINE REPAIR COMPANY IN CHICAGO.

The Chicago Moving Picture Supply Co., a new company in the Chicago field, opened for business last week in Suite 36, 107 North Dearborn Street. This firm carries a complete line of accessories, announcement slides, and all makes of machines and parts. Strict attention is given to the repair department, which is under the direction of R. J. Lorentz, one of the proprietors.

Mr. Lorentz, for the past eighteen months, was in the repair department of the George M. Hoke Supply Co., and for five years previous was with the Viascope Co.

Their shop is fitted with the latest and best machinery and is adequate to handle a large amount of work with promptness and accuracy.

Mr. A. H. Davis, former secretary of Frank Holton & Co., is the other partner, and he and Mr. Lorentz are well known to the trade in and near Chicago.

"THE LOVE TRAIL" (Nestor).

There is a treat in store for moving picture theatergoers in "The Love Trail." This delightful Western comedy is produced by the Nestor Film Co., and, unless we are greatly mistaken, is going to be very popular. The settings for the scenes in this picture are most beautiful, the acting splendid, and the photography positively without equal.

The story winds itself around a designing mother, who wishes her children to marry riches. Her children have not such mercenary ideas and their mother's scheming only makes them the more determined to marry for love and love alone. The mother at last sees an opportunity to carry out her plans in the arrival of a wealthy old Colonel and his daughter in the little Western town where she lives. She writes her son at college to spend his vacation at his own home and to bring his chum with him, as she has heard he is also cursed (?) with the filthy lucre, and she thinks she can kill two birds with one stone by having her son marry the wealthy Colonel's daughter and her son's chum lead her own daughter to the altar. However, she reckons without taking the young people's desires into consideration and the two girls refuse absolutely to fall in with her plans. All the Colonel's and the widow's attempts to bring the young people together are without avail, and, in order to distract the old folks' attention from themselves, the four young people decide to do a little plotting also. The boys arrange to tell the Colonel how much the widow cares for him and the girls whisper to the widow how the Colonel worships the ground on which she walks. This has the desired effect, inasmuch as the Colonel and the widow become so engrossed in each other that they have no time to plan other people's futures, so busy are they arranging their own. The boys and girls, left to themselves to do as they please, are surprised to find that they are not nearly so averse to the idea of getting married as they thought they were. So when the minister calls to make the Colonel and the widow one, he finds two more couples possessed of the same idea.

Scene from "The Love Trail" (Nestor).

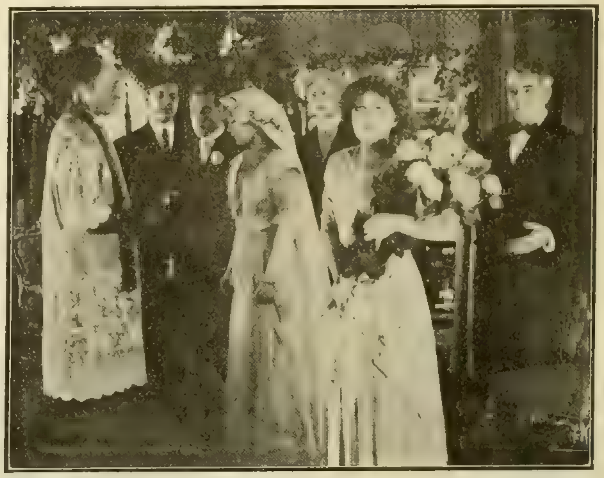
Alice Davenport as the widow is splendid. Victoria Forde and Betty Keller as the two girls cleverly handle the most difficult scenes, and last, but not least, George Gebhart and Jack Conway, portraying the characters of the boys, certainly give zest to the picture by their fun-loving propensities.

"The Love Trail" will be released Saturday, April 20th.

A VERSATILE STORY.

Heard lots about the sacrifices women have made for the men they loved, haven't we? Given them a lot of credit for it, too, haven't we? And they were worth it, weren't they? By all means. But how much more noble is the sacrifice of a woman, not for the man she loves, but for another woman, if they both love the same man.

The other woman was her sister, but she determined that she would not step in the other's way. And she determined more than that. She wanted her sister to wear clothes in fitting with the social station of the man. The man was her employer's son, and in order to obtain the money with which to buy the clothes, she—well, she thought of the safe, and the thought owned her so that she could think of nothing else, the wrong of the act included.



Scene from "While Wedding Bells Ring Out" (Rex).

On the very wedding day the theft was disclosed. Just how the story ends—and after all, it's a happy ending—you will find in "While Wedding Bells Ring Out," the Rex release of Sunday, April 21st.

STATES FOR "REDEMPTION" ARE SELLING.

Mr. A. Warner, of "Warner's Features," has closed a deal with the Feature Photoplay Co., 145 West 45th Street, New York, for several states for "Redemption," the big three-reel feature. The states are: New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and eastern Pennsylvania. Mr. S. L. Warner, sales manager of Warner's features, will leave for the coast, making stops at Pittsburgh, Cleveland, and Chicago. He expects to be gone about thirty days.

DANTE'S "INFERNO" REPEATS BIG BUSINESS IN LANCASTER, PA.

Dante's "Inferno," the greatest spectacular production ever pictured, attracted quite a big business when it played some months ago at the Fulton Opera House, Lancaster, Pa., at prices ranging from 25c to 50c. It then played a three days' engagement. The great film was again the Lancaster feature for Holy Week, and so great was the throng attracted to the theater that the spacious hall had to be closed several times during rush hours in order to cope with the crowds. The management reports that as early as ten o'clock there was a "line up" in front of the box office.

ASKING FOR CHILD-LABOR FILM.

Letters have been received from Independent exchanges reporting a strong advance call for "The Cry of the Children," the Thanhouser child-labor feature. This is the two-reel production after Elizabeth Barrett Browning's poem, released Tuesday, April 30th.

Huntingburg, Ind., March 29, 1912.

I have just bought one of your machines from Mr. Drollinger, of Evansville, Ind., and I write to state it is a PERFECT PICTURE MACHINE. It has revolutionized the picture business of this city. It has brought the people out to see the fine pictures it projects.

Yours truly,
F. W. BEHRENS.

JOSEPHINE

Released May 11, 1912

Magnificent!—Spectacular!—INTENSE!

"The Religious Marriage Ceremony."

A gorgeous one reel production, presenting remarkable acting amid elaborate settings. Beginning with the scenes in which Josephine, as a young girl, is told by a gipsy that some day she will become a queen, the film subsequently depicts her meeting with Napoleon, the gorgeous religious marriage ceremony; the negotiations for the divorce; and, finally, where, broken in spirit, she throws herself on the mercy of her Maker, a victim of Napoleon's ambition.

Special music program for "Josephine" will be mailed Free to every exhibitor upon application.

Correspondence

NEW ENGLAND.

THREE weeks after the exclusive account in these columns relative to the proposed erection of a large theater, to be devoted to vaudeville and pictures, on Tremont Row, Boston, the local dailies found it out and gave large space to the story. The property 1-4 Tremont Row has been sold by the trustees, C. E. Cotting and Philip Dexter, to Edward C. Bradlee. Readers of these columns will appreciate the vastness of the proposed theater when they understand that the assessed value of the 13,108 square feet of land is $680,000—$675,000 on the land, showing that its immense value comes from the location, and not from the present buildings standing on it. At present it is not absolutely certain that a theater will be erected, although plans calling for a seating capacity of 2,400 have been made. The original promoters of the project are now looking about for people who are financially able to swing the deal, and people in Boston, Buffalo, Chicago and other cities, have been approached in the matter. The undertaking is one of the largest ever prijected in connection with the exhibition end of motion pictures, and becomes even more so when it is understood that the property is not for sale, but must be leased for a term of years, at the end of the lease, to revert to the owner. In other words, an enormous amount of capital is needed to lease the land and build the theater, and the profit on the outlay must be made within 20 or 30 years, after which the owner of the property gets a theater, costing him nothing, plus a good big yearly rental fee.

Mr. Nathan Gordon, the main promoter of the new Olympia Theater, now building on Washington Street, Boston, told the writer that the new house will be completed April 29, provided nothing holds up the final work. The Olympia has already been delayed considerably, due to delays in construction work. Mr. Gordon can be depended upon to make a big winner of his new house, as he is conceded to be one of the shrewdest and most resourceful of New England photoplay promoters. Having a string of large houses he may be termed the Marcus Loew of New England. Mr. Gordon, in this writer's opinion, will be heard from a very great deal as a promoter of large "small time" theatrical projects. It was Mr. Gordon who first started the National Theater, Boston, the largest in the country, and who sold the lease to Mr. B. F. Keith and made a handsome profit by selling out, by the way.

Williams's Ideal Theater, Dudley Street, Roxbury, Mass., ran the "Crusaders, or Jerusalem Delivered," April 1, 2 and 3, as an added attraction for Holy Week. This new house is doing very well, with a program of vaudeville and pictures.

Frank H. Robie, lessee and manager of Pequossett Hall, Watertown, Mass., tells this writer that his theater's capacity of 800 seats is filled 4 times every week. Licensed pictures and illustrated songs have caught the fancy of Watertown people.

That junket to the plant of the Vitagraph Company by New England exhibitors, has remained as a very vivid remembrance by the "boys." The proof of this statement will not be doubtful when it is learned that these same "boys" intend to hie themselves away very soon, bent on a similar escapade. As was noted in these columns, "Pop" Lubin extended a hearty invitation to the managers to visit his plant, while on a visit to Boston. With the purpose of perfecting plans for this trip, the newly formed Amusement Association of New England has called a meeting for April 9, said meeting to be held at the Café Dreyfus, with the tax of one bean per plate. In the next issue, a report of the outcome of this social meeting will be given, together with the details of the Philadelphia trip.

The Women's Municipal League has been active in Boston of late, and advocates motion pictures for extended use in public schools. The writer understands that Mrs. T. J. Bowoker, the president, and several other members, have presented this view to the School Committee. The East Boston High School has been giving these entertainments, under the direction of the League, and its recommendations are based upon such actual experiences.

Keith's Theater, Portland, Me., which usually presents stock company attractions during the Summer season, has decided not to do so this year, and will continue to offer the usual bills of vaudeville and pictures.

A large amount of money was made for the benefit of the Lawrence, Mass., strikers, at the performance given at the Grand Opera House, Boston, on March 30. Several reels of pictures, given through the activity of the local Union operators was a feature of the evening.

W. H. Ryan has become manager of the Park Theater, Bridgeport, Conn. The Park Theater is operated by the Shea Theater Company, and Manager Ryan was moved from Manchester, N. H., where he was in charge of a Shea house. Mr. W. H. Irwine, formerly manager of the Park, has been transferred to Manchester.

Mr. T. J. McLaughlin is now manager of B. F. Keith's National Theater, succeeding Manager Ryder. The National is proving a big winner, and is probably the largest house in this country playing vaudeville and pictures.

The Victoria Theater, Lawrence, Mass., which presents photoplays and illustrated songs, is now under the management of Mr. A. Kelliman, succeeding Mr. C. H. Williams, who will soon be at the head of a new house in Westfield, N. J.

H. J. Russell, a well-known photoplay manager in Bath, Me., died very suddenly this week.

The new Empire Theater, Hartford, Conn., has been doing a very large business ever since its opening, March 16. This house has a seating capacity of about 1,400, and is showing photoplays exclusively. In view of the fact that most houses of this size feel it beneath their dignity to show a bill of straight pictures, the policy of the Empire is worthy of note.

Marcus Loew's second Boston house, the South End Theater, will end its programs of vaudeville and pictures on April 6, and, from then on, will give stock company attractions. It is worthy of note that this is the first theater in Boston which has turned from vaudeville and pictures to any other form of entertainment. Manager Louis M. Boas, Marcus Loew's New England manager, is still giving this house his personal attention in an effort to build up a business of the usual Loew calibre, but this change of policy can hardly be termed indicative of a winning business. Marcus Loew's other Boston house, the Orpheum, is reported to be doing very well, and does not contemplate any change in policy for the Summer season.

Col. Roosevelt visited Portland, Me., this week, and motion pictures were taken, showing his activities in this city.

The Globe Theater, Springfield, Mass., which has just come under the control of the Fidelity Amusement Company, reports an excellent opening of their house, with a good bill of photoplays.

The Abrams-Green Amusement Company has not as yet decided upon anyone to succeed Mr. Harry J. Russell, manager of the Dreamland Theater, Bath, Me., who died very suddenly this week.

The Passion Play was exhibited by the Premier Theater, Boston, Mass., on April 1 and 2. These reels never seem to outlive their popularity with local audiences.

The Boston Sunday American, of March 31, gave over an entire page to motion pictures. A picture of Florence Turner, the Vitagraph Girl, was a prominent feature. Eclair, Edison, Kalem, Champion, Lubin, Billy Quirk, and others came in for a lot of free publicity.

Spitz and Nathanson, the Rhode Island picture people, have leased the town hall of Bristol, R. I., and are presenting photoplays and illustrated songs. Considerable alterations were made in the town hall, and the theater has been named the Empire.

South Framingham, Mass., will soon have a new moving picture theater, as Messrs. Thereault and Wood are about to open a theater for this purpose.

Cook's Theater, Northampton, Mass., has closed and will not re-open until very extensive improvements and enlargements have been made.

Lent has slowed business down somewhat throughout New England, according to the reports of numerous photoplay theater managers, but not to the alarming extent that the "legitimate" houses have experienced.

Fred P. Dean, manager of the Hartford Theater, Hartford, Conn., reports very satisfactory results for his house. By way of excitement, Mr. Dean wrenched his ankle quite badly some time ago. Mr. Dean is now fully recovered and has resumed his active managerial duties.

Lawrence, Mass., has been the scene of one of the most bitterly fought strikes of recent years, with practically every mill-hand in Lawrence taking part. This resulted in lack of money among the strikers, with the consequent result of slow business for the local photoplay houses. The strike is now practically over, and business at the Nickel, Victoria, Pastime, Premier, Marquiese and Cosmopolitan theaters has picked up in splendid fashion.

The Dreamland Theater, Lynn, Mass., is doing a mighty good business, with pictures and songs. A popularity contest, with a gold watch as first prize, attracted a great deal of favorable comment, and also was found by Manager Hortsmann to be an excellent box-office stimulant.

A new corporation has been formed at Lawrence, Mass., under the name of the Colonial Theater Company. The incorporators are Julius Cahn, of New York, and J. P. Sweeney, of Lawrence. It was at first rumored that the Colonial Theater, of Lawrence, had been secured by Marcus Loew, and that vaudeville and pictures would be presented. This is unfounded, however, as the above concern was incorporated for the purpose of operating the Colonial. The house will present legitimate dramatic productions. The Opera House, of Lawrence, has been secured by this company, and licensed pictures and vaudeville is the policy. Mr. G. W. Gallagher, formerly in charge of the Opera House, will now be known as general manager of both houses. The Colonial, which formerly offered vaudeville and pictures, is to be thoroughly renovated. This means a switch in the policy of these two houses, as before the Opera House had the high-priced shows.

PAUL HELFER,

1555 Third Ave. New York City.

Messrs. Gray and McDonough, managers of the Nickel Theater, Portland, Me., report that they recently did a tremendous business with "The Crusaders," and with the Bison two-reel feature, "War on the Plains." New England houses are everywhere reporting these features to be winners, provided sufficient publicity is given by the theaters.

Harris and Harris, of the Star Theater, Hartford, Conn., do not seem to be greatly disturbed by the number of Hartford houses using vaudeville in connection with their picture programs. The Star continues to do a mighty good business, using pictures and songs exclusively.

The Providence Opera House, Providence, R. I., showed the Kinemacolor pictures of the Durbar during the entire week of March 18. Manager F. R. Wendelschaefer was greatly pleased with the results obtained by these reels, and gave a special performance of the pictures to the professional and business men of Providence on Sunday night, March 17. This performance was entirely complimentary, admission being by invitation only.

The Empire Theater, opened by the Keeney Corporation, at Hartford, Conn., is doing an extraordinarily good business, offering pictures and no vaudeville. Manager P. S. McMahon remarked that Hartford was ripe for a house that offered photoplays exclusively, presenting them in the best possible way, and that the Empire was especially designed to meet this requirement.

The Passion Play is still to be reckoned with as a big favorite with the public, and the Star Theater, of Taunton, Mass., reaped a big harvest this week when it exhibited these reels.

It did not take William Fox very long to decide that the Grand Opera House, New Haven, Conn., was desirable, and this writer understands that Mr. Fox has signed his name to an eight-year lease of this theater. The house has been offering the Fox brand of vaudeville and pictures for a little over a month, and Manager Jackson reports very pleasing business.

The Scenic Theater, Hartford, Conn., which has been doing a very nice business with photoplays, is about to close, not from lack of business, but because the property is to be used by the owners themselves, the Travelers' Insurance Company.

The Wonderland Theater, New Haven, Conn., has come under the control of Messrs. Norton and Gentile. The house will play photoplays and songs, as does the Studio, another New Haven photoplay house, operated by this company.

New Haven has over 25 theaters offering photoplays, which is a very large number, considering the size of that city.

The theatrical interests of Providence, R. I., are divided in their attitude towards a bill now up before the legislature which, if passed, would allow Sunday entertainments of practically every description. As is often the case, the photoplay interests favor one thing, and the "legitimate" folks, the opposite. The Empire Theater, playing the "legitimate" attractions, is decidedly opposed to Sunday shows. This theater issues a house organ called the "Dramatic Tip." We quote as follows: "As to our attitude towards legalizing Sunday performances in Rhode Island, we declare our unalterable opposition to any measures tending toward this end. However good in intent and however worthy the object for which these performances might be held, it is certain, that once the bar is removed, they will degenerate until they will end in forcing open the theaters for regular performances of current dramatic, vaudeville and moving picture attractions on every day and night of the week." A beautiful piece of high-sounding rhetoric, which, at a casual glance, might seem disinterested. However, every moving picture man can easily read between the lines. It means that the high-priced theaters feel that they won't be able to do much business on Sundays, and that they fully appreciate the fact that the photoplay theaters are able to do tremendous business on that day. Boston, Mass., is an example, as every photoplay theater plays to S. R. O. on the Lord's Day, while the big theaters don't even find it worth while to be open. In Providence, it's a pure case of "Sunday shows can't help us, and we won't let them help you." The serious part of it is that the chances strongly favor the defeat of the bill, as the photoplay interests are weak in comparison with the strength of the "big" (?) men.

Evidently the Central Square Theater, Lynn, Mass., does not know what sort of entertainment to offer, having made three changes of policy within the month. The Central Square opened the season with vaudeville and pictures, changing to musical comedy with the new year, owing to poor trade. After a couple of weeks of musical comedy, the management tried a straight stock company. The result of this change was so poor as to close up the house. It will now reopen as a straight picture house.

Messrs. Haines and Wyman have completed all plans for the erection of their new house, the Park

GREAT NORTHERN SPECIAL FEATURE FILM CO

No 42 EAST FOURTEENTH ST., N. Y.

Theater, of Dexter, Me. The location is on Main Street, and work is now under way. The house will open about September 1 with a bill of vaudeville and pictures.

A new theater to offer vaudeville and pictures is promised to Worcester, Mass., but full details are withheld.

After April 1, pictures and vaudeville are to be presented at the Academy of Music, Fall River, Mass., and the traveling "legitimate" attractions are to go to the Savoy Theater, which has been offering high-class vaudeville. Julius Cahn, lessee and manager of the Academy and Savoy, is sponsor for this statement. It is understood that the Savoy Theater will be closed as soon as the attractions originally booked for the Academy have played as contracted for. Mr. Cahn stated that his new plan of vaudeville and pictures for the Academy means reduced admission prices.

The control of the Majestic Theater, Keene, N. H., which has been held by C. W. Sheafe, has been sold by him to D. P. Alden, a Western theatrical man who has been connected with some of the largest and most pretentious theaters in the West. The new management will continue the same policy of independent pictures and songs that was followed out by Mr. Sheafe. The latter has not quite decided which of several attractive offers he will take, but the chances are that Charlie will be seen as manager of a theater not very far from Boston. Local managers—have a guess!

Pathe is always on the job looking for topics for the "Weekly," and had a camera man in Boston who filmed the Evacuation Day Parade.

The members of the Boston Moving Picture Operators' Local held a special meeting on Wednesday, March 20, to act on its 1912-1913 wage scale and working agreement. The meeting was held at 11:30 p. m.

HENRY.

IN THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

Howard H. Tuggle, 32 years old, formerly manager of the Colonial moving picture theaters at Springfield, Ill., and Quincy, Ill., and later of Oklahoma City photoplay houses, ended his life March 19 at Kansas City, Mo., by taking carbolic acid. He was a good musician and in the houses he managed did much to improve the quality of the performances by a faithful playing of the pictures. Domestic troubles is given as a probable cause for the act; he had been divorced from his wife, also a picture show manager.

George Gruble, of Kansas City, Mo., may open a moving picture show at Quincy, Ill., it is reported.

Albert & Yeager, of Rochelle, Ill., are trying the plan of three reels, changed daily, in a town of no great population.

The Mutual Vaudeville Association of Chicago has been incorporated with capital stock of $1,000 to conduct amusement enterprises. The incorporators are J. P. Grier, H. A. Sullivan and J. B. Dandridge.

The Majestic Theater, Freeport, Ill., used two Kalem pictures for a St. Patrick's Day program, "You Remember Ellen" and "His Mother."

Samuel Alschuler, of Chicago, Democratic candidate for governor of Illinois, is using moving pictures. He was unable to speak in all the towns of the State and had a film made of himself, showing the platform with its traditional quota of prominent citizens and water pitcher. The cordial reception to the candidate was pictured and, after a few eloquent gestures, he retired amid applause. The picture will be exhibited wherever possible.

W. A. Jones is the new manager of the Odeon Photoplay House at San Antonio, Texas.

Roy and Harry Hunt and Ellis Jackson, of Bushnell, Ill., have purchased the airdrome in that city, from Clem & Griffith, and will give moving pictures and vaudeville this summer. Mr. Jackson has been the owner of Dreamland Theater.

T. Sinclair, of Pekin, Ill., is reported to have sold Dreamland, a moving picture show in that city, to William Clendenin, who in turn sold it to D. C. McClellan.

Laymen of Bloomington, Ill., have begun an organized fight on the Sunday theater, which is an issue in the coming election. Merchants who are church members will carry cards in their store windows urging the defeat of the proposition to allow the photoplay houses to open.

A Frankfort, Ind., paper, in reviewing the proceedings of the village officials, says that it was recommended that the shooting gallery be closed at once and that the matter of prohibiting moving picture shows will be looked after at an early date.

After proprietors of three moving picture shows and laboring people had expressed an opinion before the city council of Quincy, Ill., it was decided to leave the license fee for five-cent moving picture shows at $50 a year. Above the five-cent admission the fee will be $75 which will necessitate additional license money if a ten-cent "special" is offered.

T. E. Epperly is building a new opera house at Tallula, Ill.

Henry Fisher, who has been conducting a moving picture show at Petersburg, Ill., has gone to his home at Hopedale, Ill., to rest.

Manager W. A. Nolting, of the Lyric, Neoga, Ill., is now giving Saturday matinees with three reels of pictures.

T. L. Lane is president of the recently incorporated Fillmore Opera House Company, of Fillmore, Ill., which will erect an amusement house in that city.

Jesse Chance, Jr., of Farmington, Ill., has sold a half interest in the Lyric Moving Picture Theater at that place, to John Turl.

The Jeffries-Johnson fight pictures caused some considerable agitation when presented at Macomb, Ill.

Charles Quaintance is now pianist at the Princess Theater in Beardstown, Ill.

The city council of Monroe, Wis., went on record by a vote of seven to one in opposition to interfering with the operation of moving picture shows on Sunday evenings.

When the feature reel, "Cinderella," failed to reach the Bijou Theater, at Cairo, Ill., in time for the afternoon performance, Manager Travis Kimmel and Press Agent Farnbaker made arrangements with the manager of the local telephone exchange to have the operators notify the 1,200 patrons of the delay. The result was that when the film did arrive at night, it was impossible to handle the crowd.

An unusual feature in the moving picture world was the public expression of sympathy made by moving picture show managers in Springfield, Ill., at the death of C. H. Wineman, manager of the Savoy. Each of the six remaining managers used a two-inch double column black bordered advertisement extending sympathy to the family.

The Lincoln Water and Light Company, of Lincoln, Ill., gave four prizes of electric appliances to patrons of the Star Photoplay Theater in that city, when the reel "Every Husband's Opportunity" was exhibited.

The X-Ray Theater at Lincoln, Ill., has been sold again. The new owners are Silva & Swanland, of Springfield, Ill.

Miss Lillian Kremer, piano player at the Biograph Theater in Alton, Ill., is said to have averted a panic when a film caught fire. She kept on playing. W. T. Sampson, the operator, was slightly burned.

A committee was appointed by the Champaign Women's Christian Temperance Union of Champaign, Ill., to consider the proposition of Mrs. Mary Lee to have a municipal play house, which would provide wholesome moving pictures as well as other amusement. "The way it came to me," said Mrs. Lee, "was on account of the paper which I read last week before a section of the Women's Club. The subject was 'Woman in the Law,' and I got to thinking afterwards how women would run the city were they given full charge of the government of it. Of course finances would necessarily be an important consideration. We would have to provide some good, clean way to replenish our city treasury from time to time. I believe the moving picture theater has come to stay. Why not make it a source of city revenue as also an education to the population? And so I evolved the idea of a municipal moving picture show."

C. H. Wineman, owner of the Savoy Theater, North Sixth Street, Springfield, Ill., died suddenly at his home in that city March 8. He was known throughout the state for his work in the Independent Order of Red Men.

When it was announced that Decatur, Ill., schools wanted a moving picture machine, with no appropriation for the purchase, Dr. T. W. Galloway gave a luncheon at the Decatur Club to a dozen prominent citizens and the subject of raising a fund was discussed. A committee was appointed to secure the needed money.

The J. B. Felber Moving Picture School Company, of Cleveland, Ohio, has increased its capital stock from $1,000 to $5,000.

The trend of the industrial film was shown recently when H. A. McKeene, secretary of the Illinois State Farmers' Institute, told a representative of The Moving Picture World that the reel "The Romance of the Reaper," controlled by the International Harvester Company, would be shown at many meetings the coming year. True, there was some advertising in it for the harvester company, he admitted, but it was an educational exhibition—one which the company had been invited to give at leading agricultural colleges. "Not only does it inform as to grain, a leading crop here, but interesting facts as to other phases of farm life are developed. The value of sanitation is urged by displaying bacteria, and other pertinent topics are treated in a like manner. The harvester company has been giving this lecture throughout Illinois this winter, co-operating with their local agents. Invitations are mailed and tickets are secured by calling at the local dealer's store. The exhibition of the pictures at the Opera House is accompanied by a lecture and other entertainment.

Capt. C. C. Healy, commander of the mounted police of Chicago, is illustrating with moving pictures his lecture, "Street Traffic Conditions in Chicago and Europe."

Gene Gauntier's notable production was recently advertised in Lincoln, Ill., as "Arrah of the Skies."

Contrast between old and new factory conditions in Minnesota may be shown by moving pictures as a part of the Union Labor Forward Movement soon to begin there. Dangerous buildings and railroad yards, sweatshops and their sanitary substitutes and other improvements due to the work of the Minnesota State Labor Bureau, may be filmed.

An evening of grand opera with the moving picture machine and the phonograph is tentatively upon the program of the traveling University of Minnesota. It is planned to spend some time in twenty-four small cities of the state offering 50,000 residents a concentration of higher education.

J. C. Matthews and S. Bristow of Chicago, have leased the Family Theater at Dixon, Ill.

In the darkness, Assistant Manager Harvey of the Lyric Moving Picture Theater at Champaign, Ill., watched an unidentified patron decorate the aisle linoleum with tobacco juice. He telephoned for a policeman. When that official arrived the lights were turned on and Harvey with a mop, approached the visitor and requested him to clean the floor. The stranger indignantly refused and denied that he had expectorated. As Harvey had watched him, the policeman interfered and, rather than go to jail, the visitor wielded the mop, while the pianist ground out the ragtime and the audience tittered.

The Star Photoplay, Lincoln, Ill., kept faith with the children who were disappointed when the film "Jack and the Beanstalk" failed to arrive for a Saturday matinee. The picture was held over and they were admitted free Monday after school was dismissed for the day.

The Star Theater at LeRoy, Ill., is being remodeled.

Timmons & Pritchard are managers of the Photoplay House at Lovington, Ill., effective April 1.

R. E. Bishop is again owner of the Grand Theater at Mt. Olive, Ill., having purchased it from Ben Beardsley. Mr. Bishop has closed the Arcade and is conducting only the Grand.

Miss Blossom Bunn has resigned her position as piano player at the Empire Theater, Lincoln, Ill., to accept a similar place at the X-Ray in that city.

LOUISVILLE.

After weather that has rivaled the famous 57 varieties of pickles, the Weather Man in Louisville has relented and is giving exhibitors a little sunshine and warmer temperature, with the result that the public is again attending the picture theaters in force.

The Princess Amusement Company has secured the Kentucky rights to the Nick Carter film, manufactured by the Atlas Manufacturing Company of St. Louis, and has shown the big three-reel feature in its houses. While the posters are a bit too lurid to suit some of the more conservative exhibitors, the film itself is one that has appealed to the public, as evidenced by the crowds that witnessed the famous detective's solution of the jewel mystery.

"Cy" Reinhart is in New Albany for the present, and is singing at the Grand Theater, operated by the Falls Cities Amusement Company. He will return to Louisville shortly. In the meanwhile, Freddie Wells and Miss Grace McAvoy, tenor and contralto, are filling Cy's shoes successfully. Both are popular with Louisville theater-goers. Cy holds the distinction of being the highest salaried vocalist in any Louisville moving picture house. The Falls Cities Amusement Company is progressing nicely with its uptown house, and the theater will be reopened in a month or so as the Highland. The name has already been changed twice, officers of the Falls Cities having confidence in the charm of the third time.

Mose Bass, owner of the Star Theater, 728 West Market Street, has announced that the house will not be reopened. The Star was recently damaged by fire, and as Mr. Bass's lease had expired, he determined to abandon the theater. The Star is one of the few uptown theaters which have not made money. It is a trifle too far out of the business district, and not near enough to the residence portion of Louisville to be a big money-maker. Mr. Bass will continue to operate the Palace Theater, at Shelby and Rupp Streets.

H. R. Harrison, until recently in charge of the Independent Film Exchange in Louisville, has resigned and returned to his home in Minneapolis, Minn. Miss B. A. Plessinger, who has been connected with the Independent, formerly the Globe, in a number of cities, has been given sole charge of the Louisville office.

Arthur V. Sheckler, representing the Gomes Theatrical Exchange, of Cincinnati, has returned from a short trip through Indiana, where he secured moving picture theaters in Seymour and other towns. He will book vaudeville for the houses. He has also arranged to give a number of theaters in Tennessee the Gomes service, splitting the bills, so that the same acts will remain but from two to four days in one place.

A new picture theater has been opened in Lafayette, Ky. The new theater occupies a building 25 x 65 feet in dimension, and will seat about 200 persons. An incline floor has been installed. Licensed pictures will be shown.

Tony Sudekin and W. H. Williams, Nashville, Tenn., showmen, have purchased the Princess Theater in Hopkinsville, Ky. George A. Bleich was the former owner. The purchase price was $12,000. Sudekin & Williams operate a string of houses in Kentucky and Tennessee and for a time contemplated the erection of a new tseater in Hopkinsville. They decided, however, to purchase the Princess. Mr. Bleich will probably enter the business at some other point. He erected the Princess in Hopkinsville, in 1911. Ernest Guill will have the management of the house, being assisted by A. F. Lee, both of whom have been with the new owners for some time.

J. H. Berry, of Lynville, Tenn., has announced that he wil begin the operation of a moving picture theater in the near future. A building is now being remodeled, and the theater will be opened in April.

The trustees of the Realty Savings Bank of Nashville, Tenn., devised a rather unique plan of disposing of the property at auction. The sale was held at the Vendome Theater, free tickets being dispensed to the public. The Vendome uses both animated pictures and vaudeville. An unusually large attendance rewarded the efforts of the bank people and practically everything was sold.

Thomas Powers, son of Col. J. D. Powers of Louisville, has graduated from the amateur stage, having joined one of the Vitagraph companies. Mr. Powers gained quite a reputation in the vicinity of Louisville as an amateur of unusual promise. His jump to the field of moving picture players was quite a surprise, however, as it was supposed that he would enter the "legit."

S. Rothschild has opened a new theater at Owensboro, Ky. The Gem, which is the name of the new house, will use the Swanson-Crawford service, getting it through the Louisville representative of the exchange, A. F. Mayer.

The Ideal Amusement Company is rushing work on its theater at Twenty-third and Market Streets, and the place will be ready for occupancy early in the summer. It will be an airdome and will cost $50,000. It will be unique in that the roof may be added at any time in case of rain, and few shows will be lost on account of bad weather. Fred J. Doll is head of the Ideal, which is better known as the Broadway Amusement Company.

The Associated Theaters have continued to prosper despite the prophecies that it would soon fall by the wayside. Practically every grocer in Louisville now gives away coupons, which will admit the holder to any of the Associated Theaters. The list of other business houses which handles the coupons, is also growing steadily. The tickets are given away only with cash purchases and have assisted grocers and others in doing away with credit transactions. While many moving picture men feel that the attendance should not be stimulated by such schemes, it must be admitted that, to date, the plan has exercised a beneficial effect on the houses which are known as the Associated Theaters.

G. D. CRAIN, JR.

PHILADELPHIA.

A private demonstration of the parlor moving picture machine was given at the Hotel Walton on March 19 by Mr. A. G. Buck of the Thomas A. Edison Company. "The Battle of Trafalgar" was depicted upon a 4 x 4 foot screen, fifteen feet from the projector. The purpose of these machines is to put the moving picture machine in the home. It weighs only 20 pounds and the lenses are of a varied scope which enable it to perform the work of a regular sized machine. The regular electric current for lighting purposes, reduced between 3 and 3½ amperes, was used. Light may be furnished by a small acetylene generator, or by a Nernst lamp. Small reels of films are used. There are three rows of pictures upon each, so that a roll of eighty feet will contain as many thrills and laughs as a standard reel of 1,000 feet.

H. G. Knight will open a new house called the Wayne Opera House, at Wayne, Pa. He has bought a No. 6 Powers.

Ritch & Kamp's Orchestra give an orchestra contest ever Friday and Saturday night at the Twentieth Century Theater, Manyunk, which has attracted large crowds.

Miss May Boyle, a well-known singer in moving picture parlors, eloped to Wilmington, Delaware, several weeks ago and was married.

W. R. Koch will open a vaudeville and moving picture house at Thirtieth and Washington Avenue, Newport News, Va., about May 1. The house will have a seating capacity of 350.

The Calehuff Supply Company have shipped two Edison Model B's complete to the Martin Theatrical Company at Richmond, Va., where, it is understood, they will open a large theater

Nathan Friedenberg, a special officer from a moving picture parlor at Fourth and South Streets, stopped a runaway horse by making a flying leap and grabbing the bridle. He was dragged about twenty feet, but was not injured. In its dash the horse upset several fruit venders' carts. Many persons were on the street at the time.

Thomas J. Ryan has obtained a permit to build a roller coaster at the Old Point Breeze Driving Park, which, it is said, when completed, will equal Coney Island. Alterations will be made to the clubhouse on the track. The cost of the work is given as $25,200

It is expected that between 200 and 300 of the leading manufacturers and business men of Europe will visit the plant of the Lubin Manufacturing Company to see the moving picture from the inside, while attending the Fifth International Congress of the Chamber of Commerce and Commercial Associations. After holding their business sessions in Boston, the delegates will visit Philadelphia and a number of other cities for the purpose of seeing how industry is carried on in this country. The various local associations are arranging entertainments and receptions for the visiting delegates.

Articles of incorporation have been filed in the state of Pennsylvania for the Beach and Park Amusement Company of Pennsylvania. The incorporators are: Thomas Evans, Clifford I. Enochs and John T. Power.

The Fallansbee Brothers Company, Pittsburgh, Pa., have recently completed moving pictures of their Open Hearth Works, Tin Plate and Sheet Mills, showing from start to finih the manufacture of roofing tin. These pictures are shown at all conventions of hardware associations, and have attracted wide attention. Other national advertisers have under consideration plans to use the moving picture to advertise their products. This picture entertainment is in three reels, approximately 3,000 feet of films. The use of tests by the metalurgists are shown, both at the furnace and in the laboratories directly in connection with the furnaces. The furnaces are tapped and the pictures show the molten metal flowing into the ladle, after which the ingots are cast. The ingots can be seen moving from the open hearth pit, carried to the re-heating furnace, and from there taken to the hammer, under the 800-ton blows of which the ingots are reduced to billets. The sheet bars can be seen being re-heated, then rolled into sheets. The picture is closed by showing tin plate being stamped, trade-marked, boxed and loaded into the cars for shipment. By having these pictures the sheet metal workers throughout the country can be made familiar with the best practices in making tin plate as it is impossible for many of them to visit the mill. It is the intention to show these pictures throughout the country.

The Lyric Theater, No. 728 Girard Avenue, has changed hands. Mr. T. C. Tague was formerly manager of the house.

In an address at the opening of the Teachers' Institute, Pottsville, Pa., on March 25 on "Social Forces Pushing Good Boys and Girls Into Crime," J. Adams Puffer, director of the Beacon Boys' Bureau, Boston, declared that while newspapers are the best means of education and should be handled in the school room, so that pupils may know how to read and select, he deplored the awful impressions made by the reading of murders, suicides, divorce scandals and other sensational happenings.

"The moving picture business," continued Dr. Puffer, "should be connected with the schools. Good historical pictures should be encouraged, and would give the children a chance to see the actual conditions.

T. P. Bloomfield, of the Motion Picture Screen Company, manafutcurers of the Mirror Screen, was in town on March 23, and then left for the West.

While alterations and improvements were being made. The Savoy Theater, McKeesport, Pa., which was closed for some time, was reopened last week. The interior of the house has been re-decorated and the seating capacity has been increased.

The annual banquet of the Theatrical Treasurers' Association of Philadelphia was held at the Continental Hotel on March 25. Covers were laid for 300 persons. The theatrical world in all its phases was well represented. The officers of the association are: Fred Nathan, president; Leon T. Carpenter, vice-president; T. G. Sullivan, secretary, and Mark Wilson, treasurer.

Within another year J. Fred Zimmerman will build two more vaudeville and picture houses in this city. This will give him four houses devoted to this form of entertainment. He at present has the Keystone and Liberty Theaters. Mr. Zimmerman says the theaters will be built by him alone without financial or other aid from outside sources. M. W. Taylor, now managing the Liberty and Keystone theaters, will be placed in charge of the quartet of houses. The two new houses will cost in the neilghborhood of $150,000 each it is said.

Messrs. Karrer & Haines have taken over the Lyric Theater, Atlantic City, N. J. Alterations will be made and the seating capacity increased.

The Calehuff Supply Company has secured the agency for the Motiograph Machine in addition to the Powers and Edison machines, and the Mirror Screen.

Charles Campbell, the well-known operator at the Mirror Theater, was taken suddenly ill on March 25 and will be laid up for some weeks.

A new vaudeville and picture house will be erected at Broad Street and Snyder Avenue. The site for the theater, which was purchased recently, is on the West side of Broad Street, twenty feet north of Snyder Avenue, and has a frontage of 110 feet and a depth of 157 feet. The house will have a seating capacity of 3,000, and the ground will cost close to $200,000.

The unofficial announcement that Felix Isman, who handled the real estate end of all the moving picture operations of S. Lubin, George H. Earle and other important factors in the moving picture business of this city, is about to remove to New York has put a serious damper upon the comprehensive scheme for the building up of a business section at the junction of Market and Fifty-second Streets. Here it was proposed to invest upwards of $3,000,000 in the building of model stores, moving picture theaters and all sorts of structures making for commercial development, and a popular thoroughfare was to be made of Fifty second Street, after the lines of Forty-second Street, New York. Isman was the originator of the idea and he created the impression that the Real Estate Trust Company was the backer of the enterprise. Now, on the eve of the project materializing, Isman permits announcement to be made of a reorganization of all his business ventures here and his removal to New York. If this community plan should fail to pay here, similar schemes being worked out all over the country will surely go by the board as all of them are patterned after the Philadelphia plan.

Frank H. Stewart of the Calehuff Supply Company, recently went to Richmond, Virginia on a business trip.

CLEMENT H. CONGDON.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Tom Moore, who is frequently referred to as "the Original" moving picture man in this city, has lately added the Majestic to the chain of theaters under his control, which now number nine. These are situated in various parts of the city, four of them being in the downtown district. The Majestic, which is now undergoing manv repairs and improvements, will be open by the time this is in print, combining several specialties with the pictures, and the admission will be only 10 cents. Jonny Nestor, well known at the seashore in the summer and in New York the greater part of the winter, has been engaged by Mr. Moore for illustrated songs at a very high salary. This engagement was only possible on account of the increased attendance drawn by this singer.

Mr. Moore has succeeded recently in securing several specialties for his houses that fit in exactly with a picture program. In these the stereopticon plays an important part with the artist. Mlle. Savoy was a decided novelty to picture-goers as one of such specialties.

Upon Mr. Moore's recent return from a short visit to New York, he said: "Other large theaters will be added to the Moore Amusement Company, not only here but in other cities. I will control some decidedly new reels, and may give Washington an expensive show with high prices for the elite. Arrangements have been made whereby my houses will use specialties and singers above the average material seen in the small theater. Big prices are being paid for these, but I find it worth while. Having been in this sort of business myself, I just can't tolerate trashy vaudeville, even if the public could. I saw lots of my friends in New York, but my visit was too short to accomplish all I wanted, and will probably have to go again to complete some propositions offered me."

With the introdlction of feminine ushers at the Cosmos patrons are escorted to their seats by charming young maids in uniforms of black and red.

The installation at the Plaza of a second machine makes it possible to run two and three reel subjects without any waits for change. This proved especially helpful in the recent showing of a number of "features," by increasing the number of exhibitions during a day's run as well as more completely entertaining the spectators.

Photoplayers of the various companies may be had in postal card form at local stores, thus enabling picture enthusiasts to secure their favorites. It would be difficult to state which ones are in the lead, for all have admirers.

The Empress has been drawing big crowds with the "Bison 101 Ranch" features, occasionally retaining a reel for two days. "Old Wyoming Days" was a recent feature at this house.

While some educators may still be decrying the "evils of the motion picture," I have been quizzing our local teachers and it is universally admitted that the children who attend the picture shows are the quicker, more apt, and more alert pupils. Their ideas are more original and their sight quickened. While the scenic, industrial, scientific, and weeklies are admittedly instructive in the school room, the attendance at moving picture shows even helps in mathematics, by assisting mental calculation, and makes such pupils decidedly more interesting in recitation as they have had practice in repeating the photoplays to their friends. It even assists the memory of children backward in this direction.

MEDICINE HAT, CANADA.

The Dreamland Theater is a photoplay house, seating 300, with a daily service, three reels of licensed films and illustrated songs. A young lady from Chicago sings the songs as they should be sung. Latest music by four-piece orchestra.

The Monarch Theater was completed in December. It is owned by Messrs. Ready and Finley. The Monarch is up-to-date, with a beautiful front installed by the Decorators Supply Co. of Chicago. Seating capacity 500, with a daily change of three reels. Independent films. Music by four-piece orchestra.

The Star Theater has been doing business for the past seven years; owned by Mr. E. D. Bentley. The admission to photoplays here: Matinee is 5 and 10 cents; evenings 10 and 15 cents. About all American films used.

Mr. Max W. Herring has sold his interests in the Rex Theater of 6015 Penn Avenue, E. Liberty, to Reichbaum Bros., of this city. Although these gentlemen are inexperienced in the moving picture game they have been doing nicely and expect to make a success of this playhouse. This house has always proved a paying one, so that success should prove an easy matter to two good business men.

putting on bigger and better attractions every day. The Alhambra has a seating capacity of 800 seats and is charging a nickel for quite a big show, comprising four reels of pictures and a high class act.

The Palace of 2231 Centre Avenue has been sold to Matthew Teplitz, who was formerly connected as chief never-make-a-mistake booker at the Pittsburgh Photoplay Co., of this city. Miss Zelda Teplitz, formerly postermiss at the Independent Film Exchange, has resigned her position and is now presiding over the receipts at the Palace. Mr. Teplitz is also connected with the Superior Song Service Co., of 4085 Jenkins Arcade. His position with the above concern is that of secretary and treasurer.

Mr. H. L. Shaw, chief operator at the Carson Theater, South Side, is to be commended for his steady pictures and his inventive genius. The Carson is running Lee Lash Co. advertising slides. This theater is owned by Messrs. Mahoney and Wright and is managed for them by Mr. Roy Bell.

EDDIE WHEELER.

SOUTH BETHLEHEM, PA.

The Victor Theater, under the management of Herman Burak, is running feature films in addition to the regular program and is doing a rushing business.

Lew Burak, veteran manager, is having the Breeze, an open air theater, renovated and repainted and expects to re-open about May 1st. Independent films will be run here.

Lyman H. Howe's travel pictures were presented at the Grand Opera House recently and drew a large crowd.

Arthur Blacker and Jos. Capella will build an open air theater on Third Street.

Angelo Tocce, who controls the National Theater, will erect an airdome, and will run vaudeville acts and photoplays during the summer months. The seating capacity will be 1.500.

Bison "101" films, which are run every Saturday, have broken all box office receipts at the Pastime Theater, and to-day this nicklet is known as the leading independent photoplay house. A first-run service and an illustrated song form the program.

SAMUEL CRISTOL.

ST. LOUIS.

Frank L. Talbot, manager and owner of the Hippodrome and the Gem Theaters here, was presented with a $300 set of cut glass by Lodge No. 5 of the Theatrical Mechanical Association. The presentation address was made by President John Suarez. Mr. Saurez thanked Mr. Talbot for the many little courtesies shown the T. M. A. in the past. James Downing, stage manager of the Hippodrome, was another one of the speakers. Mr. Talbot in reply stated that his relations with the T. M. A. had always been very cordial and hoped for continued success and good fellowship in the future. The cut glass consisted of 14 imported pieces, among which was a 22-inch punch bowl.

The St. Louis House of Delegates is up in arms over the contemplated showing here of pictures depicting scenes, etc., showing the surrounding of the Allen gang of moonshiners and feudists in Hillsville, Va. A resolution was offered by Delegate Andrew Scully, advising the motion picture houses to refuse to show the "depraved" and "vicious" pictures.

A. D. Fintom, manager of th eGeneral Film Co., left Saturday for a short trip to Chicago.

W. M. Sauvage of the Lyric Theater, 102 W. 2nd Street, Alton, Ill., was in St. Louis the early part of the week, making arrangements for the enlarging of his house for the coming season. He reports winter business has been "tip-top."

At the smoker of the Society of Colonial Wars, held at the Washington Hotel March 30th, an interesting moving picture exhibition was given, showing scenes during the Colonial Period, 1620 to 1755 inclusive. Wm. P. Kenneth was selected for toastmaster.

Sol. S. Renco, who controls a chain of moving picture houses in St. Louis, has rented the first floor of the building at the southwest corner of Broadway and Chestnut Streets. He will install a modern, up-to-date picture house. $10,000 will be spent in remodeling the building.

Manager Severs of the Grand Central Theater, was in Chicago the past week combining business and pleasure.

Preparations are under way for a big season here at the airdomes. Delayed spring has kept back preparations for general overhauling and getting into shape, but with the advent of better weather, the next few weeks should find the airdomes ready for business.

F. J. FEGAN.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Persons interested in the moving picture copyright bill of Congressman E. W. Townsend, of Montclair, N. J., have reached a compromise, some of them having oposed it bitterly, while the others endorsed it, and the House Committee on Patents will probably report it favorably. Under the terms of the compromise an innocent infringement of a moving picture play may be punished by a fine of $100. Each additional infringement will call for a fine of $50, until a total of $5,000 is reached.

Maj. Richard Sylvester, superintendent of police, has issued instructions to his subordinates to the effect that moving pictures of the tragedy at Hillsville, Va., in which the judge, prosecutor, sheriff and court clerk were killed by mountain outlaws, shall not be shown in the District of Columbia. The films being prepared are understood to show exciting scenes in connection with the man hunt conducted in the mountains by detectives and sheriffs, forming a number of posses.

Maj. Sylvester's opposition to the showing of these pictures is based on his belief that they would have a tendency to encourage crime among the masses.

A CURTAIN CONTEST

At the meeting of Exhibitors at Dayton, Ohio, two weeks ago, every curtain manufacturer in the world was invited to a contest. They were to use the same light and equipment, the object being to prove for all time which screen was really the most perfect screen for moving pictures by a direct comparison.

We went to a great deal of trouble and expense to bring large samples to Dayton while all that other curtain manufacturers would have to do would be to bring their samples in their pockets.

When they found that the "Mirror Screen" was ready to enter into the comparative test, no one showed up. As the song says, we were "All Alone, All Alone."

There is absolutely no comparison between the "Mirror Screen" and any other manner of projection and we are willing to forfeit anything and everything that on a comparative test, with the same light and equipment, that we have the world beat with our glass curtains. In other words, we are really "All Alone, All Alone," in a class by ourselves.

THE FIRST MIRROR SCREEN

was made over three years ago. It's as good to-day as the day it left the factory, and there isn't a curtain in the world that can compare with it. Since then we have improved our Screens every year and it is to-day 100 per cent better than the first ones. It will now cost you less because we make them in bigger quantities and are better.

Everything else in your theatre will wear out.

KALEM.

A MARDI GRAS MIX-UP (April 22).—Paul and his friend, the doctor, are anxious to attend the Mardi Gras, but their wives do not favor the expedition. Not to be discouraged, the men hit upon a subterfuge and reach New Orleans, where they fall into the holiday spirit and don masqueraders' costumes. Unfortunately they adopt the same wardrobe worn by two escaped lunatics who imagine themselves to be Julius Caesar and Macbeth and are garbed accordingly.

The wives, having suspected their husbands, come to New Orleans and discover the disguise of the two excursionists. They are not aware, however, that the lunatics in the same attire are at large. The wives masquerading, meet the lunatics and thinking them to be the husbands, decide to humor them. Then the two men appear and find their wives in company with two strangers The many laughable situations which arise and the novel scenes of the Mardi Gras make this original comedy highly entertaining.

THE MEXICAN REVOLUTIONIST (April 24).—Juan, a Mexican revolutionist, encamped with his compatriots outside of Guadalayara, volunteers to enter the Federal camp and learn the enemy's numbers. While on hostile ground Juan protects Marcella, a pretty Mexican girl from the attack of an intoxicated Federal soldier. The latter is not so far deprived of his senses, however, but that he recognizes the revolutionist and gives the alarm. Juan fleeing from the Federals, seeks shelter in the home of Marcella's father, Felipe, but he is apprehended and his two friends are taken with him, charged with being sympathizers.

During the night Juan escapes from prison and joins his party, who proceed in force to Guadalayara, capture the city and liberate Marcella and Felipe. Juan's life is now beset with many dangers but he does not forget the charming girl who has shared his trials and two months later he is rewarded with her hand.

THE PASADENA PEACH (April 26).—Mary, known as "The Pasadena Peach," has many suitors but the favored one is Jack Howard. Jack visits his sweetheart and while they are enjoying a pleasant chat Mary's mother announces the arrival of Algy, a second suitor. The "Peach" tells Algy that she is obliged to do the laundry work and he gallantly volunteers to relieve her of that irksome duty. She leaves him at work and goes to join Jack, only to be met by Ned. Having disposed of Algy in a satisfactory manner, she pursues the same tactics with Ned and has him commence digging a well. Bill, Henry and Bud arrive in turn and are set to work beating the carpets stringing beads and sprinkling the lawn. Mary then joins Jack.

Soon the different laborers tire and discover the plot against them. They proceed to the hammock, where Mary is resting and discover that Jack is asleep in his chair. While they plan to cut down the hammock, Mary overhears them. She awakens Jack and they make a "dummy" of pillows, which they place in the hammock. They then hide and have the laugh on the conspirators

It is an exceedingly hot day and the several suitors who have labored so vigorously are nearly exhausted. How the resourceful "Peach" finally disposes of them makes a comical finale to an amusing story.

CINES.

THE TREASURE CAVE (April 23).—Eunice, a beautiful slave girl, falls into the hands of a band of outlaws, and is taken to their cave, in which they store the jewels and precious wares, the result of their plundering. In the meantime, an aged woman happens to catch sight of Eunice and the outlaws on their way, and recognizing the girl, rushes to inform Ben Ali, the master, of his slave's predicament.

Ben Ali hurries to the entrance of the cave, and secretly overhears the password, by means of which he soon rescues Eunice.

Later he informs the chief magistrate, who summons his soldiers, and, taking the outlaws by surprise, inflicts a terrible punishment upon them. He then publicly thanks Ben Ali and Eunice, and generously rewards them with a large quantity of the treasure.

LEAH, THE SUFFRAGETTE (April 27).—Leah becomes interested in "Woman's Rights," and, after successfully training her husband to perform the household duties, takes up the cause in earnest.

She proves so enthusiastic that she soon becomes a leader of her sex. After a vehement demonstration at their club, the ladies call upon the mayor to demand their rights. Leah carries the argument too far, however, and is promptly put in jail There she has plenty of opportunity to carefully consider the subject, and when her lord and master appears, she seems quite willing to abandon her political career and return home.

CONFUSION (April 27).—A comedy of errors caused by two young men advertising in a newspaper under the same name. One wishes a job, the other a wife.

As fate would have it, the answering letters are delivered to the wrong persons, and both young gentlemen manage to get "in wrong." Serious results are fortunately prevented just in time, by the amiable newspaper manager.

ECLIPSE.

JOHN MILTON (April 24).—On account of religious differences, Milton, the great poet, is decreed an outlaw, and ordered to leave England. Deborah, his favorite daughter, agrees to accompany her father, who is helpless on account of his blindness, and with the aid of a letter of introduction from Lord Devanant, a man of influence, and an admirer of the poet, they set out.

They have not gone far when they are suspected and arrested by a party of soldiers. Milton is carried to London and thrown into prison. Later, King Charles II pays a visit to Milton, now in a London prison. He tries to comfort the great poet in his distress by reading from the famous epic poem, "Paradise Lost."

EXHIBITION DRILL OF H.M.S "EXCELLENT" (April 24).—An extremely interesting topical subject, showing what results can be accomplished by constant practice under excellent drill masters.

ESSANAY.

"ALKALI" IKE'S BOARDING HOUSE (April 23).—Bridget, the cook on the Hard-Up Ranch, is some eat specialist on everything but soup. This, the boys declare, is bad, and select "Alkali" as the martyr to so inform her. "Alkali" does the best he can, but is bombarded out of the kitchen by the irate Bridget, who proceeds to drive the boys to the shelter of the hay loft for protection. They watch her leave with weary faces, then draw straws to see who does the cooking. "Alkali" wins the high honor and takes possession of the kitchen. But the annoying boys cause him to empty all the dinner over their heads in chasing them out, and consequently all they have is dry bread and not much of that. Next morning "Alkali" has the time of his life trying to rout the sleepy boys from bed. Not until he has emptied the contents of a bucket of water over them do they condescend to get up, and, after breakfast, "Alkali" suddenly determines he has been the goat long enough. He relieves the boys of their weapons, then forces them to wash dishes and clothes, scrub the floor and dining-room table, while he exhilarates their actions with occasional shots from his gun and gloats over their new-found misery.

THE DOCTOR (April 25).—When Dr. May Killham, a fascinating lady physician, takes rooms at the Empire Hotel, all the boys, including Howard Missimer, a gay bachelor, and his three pals, fall desperately in love with her. Missimer, at the first opportunity, shams sickness and makes the acquaintance of May, while she feeds him sugar-coated pills and charges him exorbitant fees. Missimer calls on May at her new office in the Long Acre Building, settles his bill and receives one of her new cards. This the boys see and each in turn plays sick and visits May for sympathy and pills. They pay dearly for the consultations, and are greatly relieved—in pocketbook. May now invites them all to the office on her birthday. The morning of the set day each admirer sends her a gift. That afternoon they all call at once and are having a gay time with May over a bottle of wine when a messenger boy delivers a telegram to May she reads it and instantly declares she is called away and will leave the office in charge of the boys. After she has gone Missimer discovers the telegram on the floor, reads it aloud to the boys and they are horrified at hearing May has a husband and four children who are all ill of the small-pox. Consequently the boys pack up the things they sent her as gifts and, feeling badly stung, wend their weary way homeward.

OUR NEIGHBOR'S WIFE (April 26).—David, Timothy and Jonathan are dear friends and neighbors. So are their wives. Timothy and Jonathan have a secret affection for Mrs. David. This their wives do not know. The three men meet one morning and agree to go to a political gathering at the Coliseum that night. But the moment they part, Jonathan forms another plan and Timothy has a secret scheme. An hour later Mrs. David receives notes from Timothy and Jonathan saying they will call that evening to pay their respects as long as hubby will not be at home. Mrs. David is shocked and takes David into a scheme to fool the foolish swains. That evening Timothy and Jonathan see David depart, supposedly for the meeting, and then call on Mrs. David. Naturally each is vexed to find the other has called, but make it up and prepare to spend a hilarious time over a dainty meal and bottle of wine. Suddenly the bell rings. Horrors! David has returned! Hastily Jonathan and Timothy hide in a closet, then are horrified to hear David raving angrily just outside at his wife's supposed deception and firing off an enormous revolver. Then Mrs. Timothy and Mrs. Jonathan arrive, and Timothy and Jonathan sweat blood in the closet when they are forced to listen to David making alternate love to their spouse. However, Mrs. David manages to get them out of the closet cleverly without their wives suspecting. David lets them into the scheme that has been played upon them by Mrs. David, they swear "Never again" and a toast is drunk to "our neighbor's wife."

THE INDIAN AND THE CHILD (April 27).—Jake Willis, a timber-cutter, is felling trees with a gang of men one morning when an Indian applies for work and food. Willis hires him and tells him to do a day's work first, then eat. Stolidly the Indian agrees and leaves with an axe for the forest. Now, little Flo Willis, Jake's little girl, pities the poor redskin and, when her father leaves, butters a piece of bread, spreads it with jelly and takes it out to the Indian, who, although surprised, thanks her as best he can and sits down to eat. Flo returns to the cabin and finds Spot, her dog, missing. She starts out to look for him, loses her way and is soon at the edge of the great desert. Jake now discovers the Indian eating the bread, and when he refuses to tell where he got it, discharges and drives him away. Bitterly resenting this treatment, the Indian wanders on and suddenly discovers little Flo lying in the sage-brush exhausted and consumed with thirst. With the one thought of taking the lost child back to her parents, because of the little one's kindness to him, the Indian picks her up and starts back. Meanwhile Flo has been found missing. Jake instantly suspects the Indian has stolen her for revenge at his discharge, forms a posse and starts out on the search. They come upon the Indian with Flo in his arms and feel sure of his guilt. Flo is carried to the cabin and the Indian is convicted and sentenced to be shot by Jake. Meanwhile, Flo has recovered and tells her mother the truth and that she was looking for Spot. Mrs. Willis instantly sends her running to stop the execution. Flo arrives just as Jake is about to fire, the Indian is released and Willis warmly wrings his brown hand while he hugs little Flo to his heart.

EDISON.

THE LITTLE WOOLEN SHOE (April 23).—The first scene shows us a little family brought to the verge of despair by the drunkenness of the father. When he has gone the wife resolves that their child shall not suffer from his habit, and wrapping the baby up, takes it out. One of its little worsted socks drops unnoticed to the floor. Passing along a street she picks out a house that looks attractive and lays the baby upon the steps. An automobile turns the corner and she runs away. The youth in the automobile sees her, picks up the baby and takes it to his home, where it is received by his mother as a new member of their little family.

Years pass and the child's father has become a prosperous business man. One day his automobile breaks down near a pretty suburban residence and the young man of the previous scene, passing in his pony cart, invites the man and his wife to drive up to the house while the automobile is being repaired. A children's party is in progress and "Hunt the Slipper" is the game. And the baby, now grown, brings her own little worsted sock for use in the game. At this instant the parents enter. They do not know the child, but the little worsted sock is unmistakable. Explanations follow and the reunited family closes the little drama.

A TENACIOUS SOLICITOR (April 24).—"A good position to the man who can make good" was the luring want ad that prompted Michael Flannigan, a needy individual, to make an application. He is informed by the President of the Royal Insurance Company that the job is his provided he can land Weiser Bud, the Pink Ribbon brewer, for a ten thousand dollar policy.

With the utmost confidence he presents himself at the brewer's private office and is promptly kicked out for intruding. This, however, does not discourage Michael, for he waits outside until the brewer appears and follows him about like a faithful dog, imploring him to sign the policy. While Mr. Weiser Bud is crossing the street a passing automobile almost runs him down, and, quick as a flash, Michael is at his side with an earnest solicitation to sign the policy now. Weiser Bud scorns his offer and hurries away with Michael hot on his trail. Passing a building in the course of erection, the brewer walks under a ladder and is greeted by a shower of falling mortar and bricks. Again Michael is on the spot with the accident policy. The brewer in his anxiety to evade the pursuing Michael, carelessly steps into an open cellar door. "Good-bye" for a moment. Passersby have him taken home in a cab, whence the tenacious Michael follows him and with the patience of Job sits on the brewer's front stoop awaiting his reappearance. A few hours later the brewer takes a drive in his automobile with the persistent Michael clinging to the rear of the machine. On the road the auto becomes unmanageable and the clinging Michael is precipitated to the ground. Then the car tries to climb a tree but fails and poor Weiser Bud takes an aerial flight and lands in a heap in a mud puddle. The ambulance soon arrives to remove him, but the undaunted Michael is soon on his track. At the hospital Michael again presents the policy and finally gets the signature of a sadder "Bud Weiser" man and thus covers himself with the glory necessary to become a full-fledged solicitor.

AN UNUSUAL SACRIFICE (April 26).—Two young composers love the same girl, one of them is injured in a football game and so considers himself out of the race. Between the boys there is a sympathetic feeling which amounts to a mental telegraph system—what one thinks the other knows; when an accident happens to one the other is conscious of it. After the wedding the crippled youth tries to forget his love in his work. He achieves success. His one time pal and the girl they both love find times very hard; things go from bad to worse with them until the girl is ill and the young husband, away from his partner's influence, seems utterly unable to write any more successful songs. Meanwhile the cripple has composed a song which means fame and fortune and greater influence than he has ever had. Just as he is about to have it published he learns definitely that his telepathic impression is correct; that his partner and the girl are at the verge of starvation. Going to his room he fights the battle with himself and decides to make the telepathic sacrifice of his great song. By means of their mental bond he transmits the idea and rhythm of the great song to his pal in Chicago and the latter believing it is an inspiration straight from Heaven writes down the song and puts it out as his own. Its success is instantaneous; his fortune is made. The story closes with the cripple's receipt of this news.

THE BUTLER AND THE MAID (April 27).—Jennie, a coquettish housemaid, flirts with the grocer's delivery boy and thereby incites the jealousy of her sweetheart, Frank, the butler. Frank goes to his station in the hall and, in his anger, tells the marble statue that is a part of the furnishings of the handsome home, that his sweetheart is as cold as the stone of which it is made. He quiets down, and as he is not very busy, soon becomes drowsy, and dreams that the statue comes to life and goes with him to a ball.

While they are walking along the street, a policeman meets them and questions Frank. He gets frightened, they run and as they rush back into the hall, the statue falls and breaks into a thousand pieces. His sweetheart comes down the steps and wakes him up and tells him to answer the bell.

Frank's surprise at seeing the statue whole is plainly shown and his delight that is has all been a dream causes him to make up with his sweetheart.

A WINTER VISIT TO CENTRAL PARK, N. Y. CITY (April 27).—Central Park is considered by travelers that have been the world over to be one of the most beautiful city parks in all the world, only one or two being larger. A rural gentleman and his pretty nieces add a human interest to its scenic attractiveness as we follow them through this beautiful park.

At the Fifth Avenue entrance, the first thing they see is the magnificent statue of General Sherman by the great sculptor Augustus Saint-Gaudens. Then they stroll up the East Drive to the menagerie. We follow them to the different paddocks where we find hoofed animals from all over the world. A star among them is "Toby," the largest buffalo in captivity. Next come the Metropolitan Museum of Art, the Museum of Natural History and the great obelisk popularly known as "Cleopatra's Needle," erected by order of Thotmes III, 1585 B. C., at Heliopolis, and brought to this country in 1879 from Alexandria, Egypt. The panorama of the frozen reservoir and boys playing hockey on the Mall prove attractive sights. Block House Number One is of especial historic interest, as it was erected in 1812 for the defense of the city and is one of a number that were built by its citizens. The picture closes with two really remarkable scenes of the frozen lake and the merry skaters.

LUBIN.

IN AFTER YEARS (April 15).—John Wilson is made unhappy by the whims of his wife. Their little girl, Marion, is John's consolation. Mrs. Wilson decides to leave John, and forthwith packs her trunk and departs. While Mrs. Wilson was preparing to leave, Marion sees an auto stop at the curb a few doors away. She decides to play a joke "on mamma," and crawls into the tonneau of the machine and falls asleep. The owner of the car enters and drives away, unconscious of the child in the back.

John reaches home for dinner and discovers his wife and child gone. In the meantime the auto with the child has reached another town. The owner stops at a house and enters. Marion, awakened, creeps out of auto, looks around at the unfamiliar surroundings. Frightened, she wanders away crying. Jim Connors, a newsboy, returning home finds the little tot asleep and carries her into the house to his mother. Jim and his good mother do all in their power to make Marion contented and as years pass she grows into a beautiful girl. Jim, an industrious fellow, works hard and finally succeeds in saving sufficient money to open a news stand. In the evening he attends school. Eventually he graduates as a pharmacist. Jim decides to start a drug store in a more thriving town than that in which they live and moves his mother and Marion to the same town where Wilson still conducts his drug store. Jim locates himself just across the street from Wilson's store. Wilson has allowed his store to run down. Naturally the opening of Jim's establishment puts Wilson's completely out of business. Marion, who acts as cashier in Jim's store, is devoted to Jim and their wedding day draws nearer. Old Wilson, sitting in his deserted store, looks at Connors' establishment. He decides to go to the store and upbraid Jim. As Wilson stands shaking his fist at Jim he notices Marion. He stares at her, then falls unconscious. He is carried into the house. Mrs. Connors and Marion finding that Wilson is alone, decide to nurse him back to health. Upon his recovery Wilson tells them the story of his misfortune. Mrs. Connors tells how Marion came to them and shows the garments worn by her. Wilson in the unexpected happiness of having Marion restored, regains his health, and after Jim and Marion are married, Jim generously makes Wilson a partner in the business.

THE LOVERS' SIGNAL (April 17).—Raymond Dawson and Frances Livingston are sweethearts. Old man Livingston hoes not approve of Frances having a sweetheart, because she is too young. But Raymond is persistent and will not give up the hope that love will find a way. He has been ordered away from the house several times, and the lovers found it necessary to arrange a signal, in the form of a whistle. Two girl chums of Frances, in order to have a joke, send an anonymous communication in the form of a letter, in which they state that her sweetheart is a married man. The joke results in Frances having a fainting spell, during which she loses her memory. The doctor advises, after he has tried all other remedies, that the father send for her sweetheart in the hope that he will be able to bring her memory back. This is done but the young man's presence does not have the desired effect. The young man hits upon an idea of trying the signal. He steals out to their meeting place and whistles the signal. The signal, falling upon the ears of Frances, she rushes out of the room to the trysting place and the worried father and his willing neighbors upon following, find Frances in the arms eof her sweetheart.

A GAY TIME IN JACKSONVILLE, FLA. (April 18).—Fritz and Hans decide that they will take a trip to Jacksonville, Fla. They arrive in the city and board a car, and after riding through many of the principal streets, reach the ostrich farm. They see the ostriches driven hooked up to a buggy and also ridden bareback. They then go to the alligator farm and are shown the alligators in all the various stages from their infancy to old age. They see the alligators hooked up to a wagon and driven; also see the alligators shoot the chutes. Then after taking a few rides on the roller-coaster, they make up their minds to again tour the city proper. They hire an automobile and ride through the beautiful residential section of the city. On their way they pass a couple of pretty girls, and now the auto has no attraction for them. They hop out and try to scrape up an acquaintance with the girls, but receive a severe beating at the hands of two of the young ladies' gentlemen friends. They cannot resist the temptation of picking a few oranges from an orange tree and for this receive another beating.

While passing the Morocco Temple, where the Shriners hold forth, they hear voices inside and decide to go in and see what is going on. Their presence not being desirable, and not being able to give the proper signs, Fritz and Hans are roughly thrown out. Poor Fritz and Hans meet their Waterloo while standing beside a fire alarm box. They do not know what it is and start an inspection. Upon opening the door they see a little handle and while one is lighting his pipe the other pulls the little handle down. They have unconsciously sent in a general fire alarm. We now see the doors of all the fire houses in the city thrown open and the engine and apparatus depart for the fire. The chief speeds out in his auto. The fire department arriving at the scene from where the alarm was turned in are unable to locate the fire. The chief seeing the two Germans standing by the open alarm box, asks them, "Where the fire is?" They, always ready for a joke, tell the chief that the fire is in Fritz's pipe. The chief fails to see the humor of it and orders the firemen to put the fire out. Fritz and Hans receive a good wetting after they are taken in hand by the police and placed in a patrol wagon. The next morning Fritz and Hans wishing to return home and in order they get in no more trouble, a squad of police escort them to the station and see them safely aboard the train.

CAPT. KING'S RESCUE (April 20).—In anticipation of probable trouble along the border, two troops of cavalry, in command of Captain King, are ordered to Douglas, Arizona, a little town along the Mexican border and a port of entry into Mexico. As they approach the town, the captain halts his column and goes to a near-by ranch house seeking directions as to his course. He finds standing at the gate watching his troop, the owner of the ranch, his wife and daughter, a girl of about eighteen, and a suave young Mexican, evidently in love with the ranchman's daughter. The captain gets the information he seeks and invites the family to visit the camp which the soldiers will make at Douglas. They accept the invitation. The officer quickly succumbs to the charms of the ranchman's daughter, Pearl, much to the distaste of the Mexican, Pedro. Later captain King rescues a poor Indian who is being ill-treated by Pedro. Pearl's father, who is a witness to the Mexican's cruelty, forbids him to again come to his house. The Mexican plots to get the captain out of his way and thus secure revenge. With some of his gang he waylays the soldier, knocks him senseless and throws him down a deserted well. He had previously witnessed the departure of the ranchman and his wife from their home and knew that Pearl was alone at her home. The Indian who had been befriended by Captain King witnessed the action of the Mexican, and mounting his pony, rushes to the camp for aid. He reports what he has seen to the commanding officer and a detail of troopers go back with him to the abandoned well. They rescue the captain and, with him at their head, the party proceeds to the ranch in time to rescue the girl from the clutches of the Mexican.

A NEW BEGINNING (April 22).—Calvert and Mildred Cole love each other, but have lived five years the wrong way. He leaves for his office with no word of good-by, leaving his wife ill and blue. The bookkeeper comes in late and seems much worried. Mr. Cole tells him to take the books home in the evening and balance them. Mr. Cole goes home for dinner and dines alone, his wife being out. Just as he leaves she returns. A messenger brings her a note, which reads, "My dear Mrs. Cole: Will you go to No. —— Sth St. and take some fruit, etc., for a charity patient of mine. I am really too ill to go. Would thank you so much. Yours, etc." She goes, and finds a young couple, the husband sick and the wife out at work. The wife returns and is very tender to her husband. She shows Mrs. Cole some very tiny garments and it seems to awaken something long dead in her. She goes home and dresses for a ball and leaves. The bookkeeper goes home without the books, and Mr. Cole decides to take them to him. He finds the bookkeeper's little girl very sick, and he also finds patience, love and tenderness there. He leaves the books and goes home. His wife is out and he goes to the club. He becomes restless there, and returns home, and sits before the open fireplace and goes to sleep. Mrs. Cole does not enjoy herself as much as in the past. She also returns home, and finding him asleep, leans over, after much hesitation, and kisses him. In doing so, she drops her bouquet, and he waking later, finds it. She coming back into the room, sees him press it to his lips. She kneels by his side and he hugs her.

A COMPLICATED CAMPAIGN (April 24).—Bell City, Colorado, in the midst of a mayoralty campaign. Things look bad for the "Old Party," owing to the fact the women, who outnumber the men voters 2 to 1, are united in their choice of a candidate, Miss Pinker, an old maid. The leader of the Feminist Party is Mrs. Bright, a widow of about fifty. The "Old Party," composed of the men folks, realize their impending defeat and hold a council of war. They agree that something must be done to cause discussion in the ranks of the Feminists. The "Old Party's" candidate for mayor is Colonel Pease. A committee of the "Old Party" calls at his home and tells him that they have decided to adopt desperate measures in order to bring about his election. Their plan is to have Colonel Pease visit Miss Pinker (the lady candidate), and induce her to decline the office of mayor. After much persuasion the colonel calls on Miss Pinker. He at first tries to argue the question with her, but, this being impossible, he finally proposes marriage. At this offer Miss Pinker jumps, but makes the colonel put his offer in writing. Miss Pinker startles the Feministers by announcing her withdrawal from the fight and making a speech in favor of Colonel Pease. But it happens that Miss Pinker is not the key to the situation. Mrs. Bright is the real backbone of the Feminists' Party. She makes a speech denouncing Miss Pinker as a traitor and promptly nominates another candidate, a Mrs. Ent, and the party still stands united. When the "Old Party" members read of these developments, there is much consternation. The colonel is again called upon to break into the enemy's camp. He calls on Mrs. Bright and before he gets away he has also promised to marry her. The colonel is elected, through the efforts of Mrs. Bright. Complications then develop. Miss Pinker comes with the colonel's agreement. Mrs. Bright also claims him. The colonel sidesteps both of them. Two breach of promise suits are started. The colonel absconds. Another meeting at the "Old Party" headquarters, it is decided the mayor must be brought back. Peter Lang, district attorney, is called upon to sacrifice himself for the good of the party and marry Miss Pinker. They telegraph the colonel. He returns, marries Mrs. Bright and the "Old Party" is good for another administration.

VITAGRAPH.

HOW HE PAPERED THE ROOM (April 22).—The dining-room needs papering. Jolliwell says he will do it himself. He "gets on the job," scraping the walls, covering himself with plaster from head to foot. His efforts to do the papering are worse. He upsets the paste, ruins the carpet and gets all mixed up in the paper, much to the disgust of his wife, who gives him a piece of her mind and tells him a few things we won't print. Finally, after calling in a paper hanger, Jolliwell gives it up as a bad job, seeking a little Scotch consolation with soda on the side.

MARSHALL P. WILDER (April 22).—Marshall P. Wilder has a way of entertaining an audience all his own. He has appeared on the two continents and won fame and success both at home and abroad. This picture shows us just how he has done it and continues to do it. At the same time it shows how an audience receives him in his inimitable impersonations and laughable stories that have convulsed his admirers the world over.

COUNSEL FOR THE DEFENSE (April 23).—Lynn Charter and Laura Bray are very much in love with each other. Lynn goes to New York City to engage in business. During his absence Laura meets Hammond Gowan, a wealthy man, and marries him for his money. They move to New York. Not long after their marriage, Gowan becomes very cold and abusive. Hammond Gowan has discharged one of his workmen. The poor fellow appeals to Mrs. Gowan and she promises to intercede for his reinstatement. Her intercession leads to the usual quarrel and she unconsciously and nervously handles a paper cutter, laying on the table, which she raises as if to defend herself when he attempts to strike her. The maid enters the room and sees the paper cutter in her hand.

The workman returns to his home, encouraged by Mrs. Gowan's promise, only to be driven to desperation by the death of his wife from starvation, and his children crying for food. Rushing from the room in madness, he makes his way to Gowan's home and enters. Reaching the library, he discovers the paper cutter, goes to Gowan's bedroom and kills him. Laura is arrested on the testimony of the maid who saw her with the paper cutter. Laura is placed in jail, held for the murder of her husband.

Lynn Charter comes to her assistance and offers his legal services. He subpoenas the workman and at the psychological moment in his cross examination, Lynn leads him to confess his crime. Laura is acquitted. She and Lynn acknowledge their love, undimmed by separation, time and circumstances.

THE WOMAN HATERS (April 24).—Married, but not mated are Mr. and Mrs. Henson. She soon tires of him and leaves him unceremoniously. He becomes a confirmed woman hater and confines his asociations to men of like sentiments. They form a misogynist's club, with a combined membership of three. These three old fellows take a liking to a young fellow named Dick Morley and adopt him as their son. They send him to college with the strict injunction and advice, borne of their experiences, to beware of women.

The young fellow returns from college at the end of the term. He is supplied with plenty of money by his foster-fathers and starts in to see the town. He falls in love with a very attractive woman and boasts of it to his benefactors, very much to their surprise and displeasure. He becomes engaged to the woman, brings her to the Woman Haters' apartments, and introduces her to the three old gentlemen as his intended. When he introduces her to Mr. Henson, he and she simultaneously recognize each other as former husband and wife. He tells Dick who she is. She is loath to give Dick up, but he will not listen to her overtures and she sneeringly and haughtily leaves, throwing back her defi. Harry enrolls as a lifelong member of the club.

THE PINK PAJAMA GIRL (April 26).—Mrs. Wentworth and her daughter Cecile are living at one of the fashionable hotels in the city. James Davidson, who is engaged to Cecile, has agreed to join a theater party with them. At the last minute he sends word that business will detain him and he will be unable to go. Cecile is inconsolable and refuses to go to the theater with the rest of the party. She is so upset over the disappointment she gets a severe headache and decides to retire. In her pink pajamas she is about to go to bed when she decides to write "Jamsie," giving him to understand she is not at all pleased with his conduct. She sneaks out into the hall, puts her letter in the drop and hastens back to her rooms, to find the door has sprung locked. She doesn't know what to do. Rushing into another room she seizes a man's dress coat from the bed, puts it on and is proceeding down the hall when the man follows her. She makes her way through the halls and down to the hotel clerk's desk, where she is met by a party of guests and confronts "Jamsie," who has just called to deliver a box of roses to her.

Explanations follow. She gives the coat to the man from whose room she took it and "Jamsie" throws his overcoat over her shoulders. She lovingly throws herself into his arms. At this moment Mrs. Wentworth returns. Cecile tells her what has happened and all the guests join in a good, hearty laugh at the funny circumstances which brought Cecile to such an embarrassing position.

THE VICTORIA CROSS (April 27).—Just previous to the Charge of the Light Brigade, made famous by Tennyson, in the fall of 1854, young Lieutenant Cholmondeley, of the English Army, asks Colonel Carson for the hand of his daughter Ellen. The Colonel replies: "When you have won your spurs, I will give my consent." Russia declares war against England and France and the Light Brigade is ordered to the front.

After the departure of the Lieutenant and her father, Ellen decides to become a nurse under Florence Nightingale. She offers her services and though somewhat young, is accepted by Miss Nightingale. At her father's encampment he recognizes Ellen as the nurses pass before him in review. At first he is displeased, but upon second thought is justly proud of her. She is first upon the battlefield to aid and comfort the wounded and it is there that her sweetheart, the Lieutenant, learns of her presence at the seat of action.

During the charge of the Six Hundred, Lieutenant Cholmondeley saves the life of his Colonel, defending him against the combined attacks of three cossacks, lifting one bodily above his head and casting him maimed and helpless to the ground. Ellen watches through her father's field-glasses with palpitating heart the deeds of her sweetheart and the progress of the battle.

After the war what is left of the few survivors of the Light Brigade are mustered before Queen Victoria and the young Lieutenant receives the Victoria Cross as a special mark of distinction for services rendered. The Colonel gives him his daughter Ellen, saying, "He has fairly won her and his spurs."

SELIG.

THE HAND OF FATE (April 22).—Emil Kiznoff, of the German nobility, marries Stella, the pretty gypsy barmaid. On account of his social standing, Emil swears Stella to secrecy. He presents her with jewels and money and she, in a playful mood, reads his palm. She warns him of a mysterious blonde. He laughs at her superstitions, but that night he meets the blonde. She is a high society gambler, and in his new infatuation he neglects Stella. Gradually he becomes the tool of Madame Z, the mysterious blonde, and after losing all of his money to her, he pawns his wife's jewels. This money he also loses and is now fully in the power of the adventurous blonde. She forces him to steal a valuable diamond necklace and with the proceeds to accompany her to America. Stella later goes to America and becomes a Gypsy fortune teller. She is engaged for a reception at Mrs. Ardmore's. Emil and Madame Z attend the reception for the purpose of stealing and in a very dramatic scene Stella comes face to face with the couple and exposes them to the police.

THE LAW OF THE NORTH (April 23).—Dick Benton is secretly in love with Wanda, the pretty daughter of Sandy McCollough. Sandy is a member of the N. W. Mounted Police. Benton is a worthless character and soon begins to neglect Wanda. Later he kills a man in a barraam brawl, and makes his escape. McCollough is sent after Benton. Finally, after a desperate gun fight, in which Sandy's arm is shot, the officer places the handcuffs upon Benton and starts the homeward march. Sandy is forced to rest for the night, and while he is asleep Benton secures the key and unlocks the cuffs that hold him prisoner. He starts to make his second escape, when something inside him—his long dormant manhood—rebels, and he returns to his captor. Finding Sandy still weak from the loss of blood he carries him back to town, and then with her father as witness, he marries Wanda, before marching away to serve the penalty of a misspent and dare-devil life.

THE NEW WOMAN AND THE LION (April 25).—Mrs. Millie Jones, president of "The Ladies' Hatpin Club," of Rubeville, leaves her meek and henpecked better half at home, while she goes to a meeting of the "Hatpin Club." Jones grasps the opportunity to sneak out and visit Otto's animal show, which is playing the town that day. Otto's greatest drawing card is the ferocious, man-eating, lion Bloody, and Jones stands in awe in front of the beast's cage. Mrs. Jones meantime has shown her absolute fearlessness and superiority by winning a hatpin fencing match from Mr. Smith. Jones is about to pass inside the tent, when suddenly Bloody the lion breaks out of his cage and leaps toward the frightened crowd. A panic ensues and every one scrambles for a place of safety. Bloody leaps off down the street and takes refuge in the meat market. All attempts to remove or capture the man-eater are fruitless. A corps of hastily sworn in deputy sheriffs are routed when they attempt to near the butcher shop. A band of cowboys, the fire department, and finally the militia are sent to the scene of action, but each in turn are driven back by the terrible Bloody. Mrs. Jones leaves the club and proceeds homeward. She passes the butcher shop and hears about Bloody. With a sneer for the timid onlookers, she quietly takes from her hat one of the elongated hatpins, and with this as a weapon she marches right into Bloody's hiding-place and in a few moments comes out leading the ferocious Bloody by the ear. Then she spies Jones who has left the house without her permission, but that worthy gentleman doesn't wait to congratulate his daring spouse. They say he is running yet.

THE LOS ANGELES FIRE DEPARTMENT (April 26).—The Los Angeles Fire Department was long recognized as one of the most successful, modern, and best organized departments in this country. In this remarkable picture we are shown scenes in the daily life of a fireman. We see him at his work and his play. We follow him through his remarkable training in which he is called upon to perform dangerous and thrilling feats, such as climbing lofty ladders, jumping into life nets, descending into the fiery interior of burning buildings, carrying hose up perpendicular walls, using the dangerous scaling ladders, etc., etc. Scenes in and around the world famous Byrne Building fire complete this interesting and thrilling subject.

SCENES IN KOREA (April 26).—Another picturesque travel picture, giving glimpses of the life and habits of these Oriental people.

BIOGRAPH.

THE BRAVE HUNTER (April 22).—At the Hunting Lodge there arrives a great braggadocio who boasts that he, while in Africa, only went in quest of big game, showing a lot of skins as trophies of his expeditions. Out he starts, accoutred in the most approved fashion, to add to his already extensive collection by bringing back some more embryonic floor rugs, and he came near getting them—or rather, they came near getting him.

WON BY A FISH (April 22).—Papa becomes so grouched over his bad luck as a fisherman, it causes him to eject Harry, his daughter's sweetheart, who teases him about it. The next day he starts out with the hope of better luck, and the young couple sees a chance of getting back at him. Their scheme succeeds to such an extent that papa is forced to accept Harry as his future son-in-law.

ONE IS BUSINESS; THE OTHER CRIME (April 25).—Two young couples, upon their wedding, vow to follow the straight path. One is in ordinary circumstances, the other a little better off. Later on the poor young man is thrown out of work and he and his wife are in sore straits, but the other, being a power in politics, is in a decidedly improved condition. We see him offered a bribe of $1,000 to vote for the passage of a franchise in favor of the Street Railway, with a promise of more if it passes. This he hides from his wife, for although he considers it a business transaction, he is loath to let her know, for fear she will not understand. She makes the discovery, however, when the poor man, driven to despair by poverty, tries to steal this money. Her eyes are opened when she reads the letter accompanying the money, and instead of allowing her husband to call the police, she makes him let the man go free, and see his act as she sees it. The politician now realizes the straight path is the right path.

C. G. P. C.

JANE SHORE (April 23).—This is the story of the goldsmith's wife with whom a king of England became acquainted. He was so captivated by her beauty that he made her a lady of honor in the palace. Jane so enjoyed the duties in attendance upon the Queen that she refused to return to her husband. Later the King on his deathbed sends for her and dies in her arms. The Duke of Gloucester, the King's brother, accuses her immediately after the King's death of witchcraft and she is stoned to death by the enraged populace.

THE QUEEN'S MESSENGER (April 26).—The Queen of France was anxious to send a message to her very good friend, the Duke of Buckingham, and she selected for the task the man whose life she had saved. The Queen and Cardinal Richelieu were enemies and the Cardinal did his best to thwart the Queen's every wish. The Queen's messenger had a sweetheart who was an enemy of the Cardinal's also, and Richelieu finding out about the messenger, decided that by capturing him he would wound two enemies at the same time. The messenger is captured and tortured to make him reveal the secret of the Queen, but is true to his trust and dies.

PATHE.

THAT HOUN' DAWG (April 29).—This story is based on that now famous song which blew in from the Ozark region. Whom the author of this gem is nobody seems to know; but the film is a screamingly funny comedy from beginning to end.

THE CHARCOAL INDUSTRY IN CUBA (April 29).—This film shows in an interesting manner the gathering of wood, the building of the furnace, the burning and shipping of the charcoal.

FOR THE PAPOOSE (April 25).—A squaw man is tired of his Indian bride and falls in love with the daughter of a white settler. He persuades the Indians with whom he lives to attack the settlers' camp and kill all but the white girl, with whom he later escapes, taking his Indian child with him. He is pursued by the squaw's brother, who in a desperate fight kills him.

FOR HIS MOTHER'S SAKE (April 27).—A young man, the only son of his widowed mother, is infatuated with an adventuress. She endeavors to get him to purchase for her a $500 necklace. The jeweler who brings the necklace, however, is an accomplice of the adventuress and their scheme is merely to divide the $500 between them. The youth having no money, steals it from his mother's escritoire and seen in the act by the poor woman, who is heartbroken at her son's wickedness. The son, however, discovers that his mother has pawned all her jewelry to raise this money to pay the debt remaining at college for his tuition, and his better nature asserting itself he returns the money to its place and later discovers the plot which almost ruins him.

MELIES.

WIDOWERS THREE (May 2).—Tom, Dick and Harry, just graduated from college, "touch" their fathers for enough to enjoy a last vacation in the mountains. The advertisement of "The Misses Jones' Star Ranch" takes them to Bear Creek, California, where, however, the Misses Jones prove to be too elderly to be of interest. But three nieces of the Misses Jones turn out to be winners and the boys shine up to these.

When Tom's father receives a telegram reading, "Dick, Harry and I are going to marry the three cowgirls I wrote you about. Send me another hundred. Your son, Tom," he gets into communication with the other two fathers, and they decide to go and stop the affair. Their anger is great.

But the fathers are widowers—widowers three—and when they espy the three charming girls, their anger at the boys turns to jealousy. The idea that three such winsome girls should marry peniless boys! Huh! Why not marry them themselves?

But the Misses Jones rather admire the elderly gentlemen and contrive to snare them into their own matrimonial bonds. But these hard-headed business men are wise, and by a clever ruse gain the old maids' consent to marry their nieces when the boys do not show up "at the church." Why do the boys not appear at the church? The fathers can best answer.

CHAMPION.

WINONA (April 22).—Bert Morris, Jr., a young man of excellent family, while sowing his wild oats, offends his father and is disinherited. Bert decides to go West. He first calls on his fiancee, Alice Norton, to ask her to wait for him till he can make his fortune. She, however, is not pleased with the prospect and refuses to wait until he acquires wealth. The girl returns the engagement ring to him and turns her back on him. Bert is broken-hearted and leaves for the West.

He joins hands with two other young men in prospecting. They strike pay ore and promote a mining company. During their prospecting work, Bert meets Winona, a beautiful Indian girl, who lives on a nearby Government reservation and who has attended the Government school. A deep attachment springs up between these two. While his partners are away Bert is taken ill and Winona nurses him. When he becomes convalescent Bert and Winona are married.

A new company is to be formed to take over the mining claims of the boys. Bert's father goes West in the interest of foreign capital, taking Alice with him, who has been married and left a widow. Learning of Bert's lucky strike she determines to win him again. Alice arrives and Winona witnesses the meeting between Bert and Alice. The Indian girl sadly concludes that they are enamored of each other, and, gathering her child in her arms, she silently steals away. It does not take Bert very long to discover Alice's deception and instead of returning with his father's party he makes his get-away and goes in search of Winona. He finds her not long after sorrowful and grief-stricken, but with his return, she is quickly made happy and the little family is joyfully reunited.

BROTHERS (April 24).—This subject deals first with a woman who has lost her husband. Her two boys are now her mainstay and support. These boys are aged respectively 6 and 8. They sell papers and give their earnings to their mother. The elder of the boys is inclined to be wild and one day he is arrested for crap playing and is sent to a reformatory. He escapes from the institution and returns to find his mother is dead and his brother gone, the younger brother having been taken in charge by a Catholic priest.

Thirty years now go by and we witness several stirring scenes of contrast in the lives of the brothers. The elder is dissolute and follows the career of a burglar; the younger has been raised by the good priest who closed his mother's eyes, and, following the trend of his bring up, has become himself a priest of God.

One day, the burglar is hotly chased and we see him dash into the church wherein his brother, the priest, officiates. The latter answers his appeal for protection and goes out, locking the door—shutting it against the minions of the law. Later, the wounded man discovers, through a large picture of the mother on the priest's wall, that his saviour is his own brother.

He is dying now, and, exhorted by the priest, asks forgiveness of God for his sins. The priest gives him absolution and the repentant sinner passes to the throne of God. The mother appears in a vision blessing her two sons. The one just departed for realms of bliss and the other, a holy minister, who still lives to fight for righteousness.

IMP.

A MILLIONAIRE FOR A DAY (April 22).—Fred Dudley, who is a mechanic, suddenly becomes heir to a fortune. He gives up his job and goes to the bank and demands all the money, in cash. From there he visits a clothing store, where he invests in an entire new outfit. On the way he decides he needs a shine and after getting same, engages the bootblack, Sneeze, to act as his valet. He rigs him out, and charters a special train on the Lehigh Valley Railroad, from Wilkes-Barre to New York. The entire crew are handed money lavishly.

On his arrival in New York he is met by two men, who claim previous acquaintance. They start him right by taking him to the Hotel Astor. From there he starts out to see the town; doing the theaters, the Bowery, the Tenderloin, where a Turky Trot dance is in progress. He ends the day of amusement by playing faro and loses every cent. Being unable to pay his taxicab bill he is arrested, and arraigned in the night court, where he tells his story to the judge, who discharges him with a reprimand on condition that he leaves town immediately. We next see Fred in the freight yards loking for a car which will bring him to Wilkes-Barre. After two days on the road, he arrives home, a sadder and a wiser man. The foundry looks good to him and he goes back to the foreman, asking for his old job again.

THE LOAN SHARK (April 25).—Jacob Elliott, who is in moderate circumstances, finds after the death of his wife and daughter that he must apply to a loan shark to obtain the money in order to settle his many bills. He falls into the clutches of a grasping usurer, who seeks to ruin him. Driven to desperation he steals, and when found out, attempts to kill his daughter, Helen, and himself rather than face the disgrace. The loan shark's daughter Gertrude, is thrown from a buggy when attempting to drive a spirited horse, and is seriously injured. A delicate operation must be performed, and Dr. Fenlon, who is the fiance of Helen Elliott, and the only physician who is able to perform this operation, is called in.

Learning of the old clerk's financial condition, the doctor demands as a fee from the loan shark, the power of attorney, the principal and the interest, on account of which he has been bleeding Jacob Elliott, and the usurer yields to save his daughter. The operation is successful and the doctor hastens to Elliott's home with the glad tidings. He arrives just in time to prevent the awful act of destruction, and the picture ends happily, with the sweethearts in each other's arms.

U. S. ARTILLERY MANEUVERS (April 27).—It is not commonly known that the United States possesses a National Guard of a quarter of a million men, always maintained in a high state of efficiency. In this pictlre there are shown the skillful maneuvres of the U. S. Artillery. The machine-like precision of the drill and movements have been perfectly caught by the lens of the camera, and the result is a series of striking tableaux of military interest.

A PIECE OF AMBERGRIS (April 27).—A common trait of the uncultivated mind is the mistaking of base metals for gold. So that Captain Binks when he read in the newspapers that a chunk of ambergris had been accidentally found by a workman could be excused for losing his head when in the course of his love making with a laundry woman, he fell into the mistake of supposing that a strange mass of manufactured soap, which he by chance discovered on the lady's premises must be ambergris.

So as his ship was under mortgage and he had not the money to ward off the disaster, he married the widow, who is delighted to become the wife of a sea captain. Of course, the ambergris is stolen. It is recovered by Binks after a series of amusing adventures on land and sea, but lo! and behold! when he attempts to realize upon the precious substance an expert quickly deceives him as to its real value.

So Binks goes from bad to worse: he is still in debt in regard to his ship; he is wedded to a very unattractive laundry woman and he has no money. All because of fundamental ignorance of the real value of a misleading mass of soap.

THANHOUSER.

REJUVENATION (April 23).—A rich man who finds that there is nothing in life worth living for, is worse off than is a poor man in similar circumstances, for the poor man may be stricken with ambition, and in a last effort to attain fame and fortune, redeems himself.

But what is a man to do if he has wealth, health, all the fame he desires, and yet looks at life through blue spectacles?

A man of this stamp is yawning out an utterly purposeless existence. He is comparatively young. There are no business cares to vex him; he has money enough to insure comfort, and yet he is thoroughly unhappy.

He visits a winter resort down South, not for the benefit of his health. He has no chums there, his friends simply endure him, and he is as thoroughly unhappy as he had been in Europe or in the North.

Perhaps some kind fairy took pity upon him, and induced him to go out rowing all alone, for he lost his oars and drifted about aimlessly all night, believing that his last hour had come.

The good fairy so directed the boat that in the morning, when the rich man was unconscious from thirst, hunger and exhaustion, the tiny craft drifted near a lighthouse. The keeper's daughter saw the boat, swam out and guided it ashore at considerable risk to herself, and with the aid of her father restored the rich man to consciousness.

His benefactors did not know that their unfortunate guest was a rich man. They regarded him as one of themselves, and the keeper, regarding him with favor, finally offered him a job as his assistant, which he whimsically accepted.

He finds his new life so different from the old one that he positively enjoys living. He forgets his old troubles, and within a short time, decides that there is nothing that could induce him to go back to his former aimless empty existence. The keeper's daughter wins his love and makes him happy by agreeing to marry him, and he finds that each day is happier than the one that preceded it.

Years later, his old friend, who has mourned him as dead, happens to visit the lighthouse, accompanied by his wife, and is surprised to recognize in the assistant keeper the former clubman long regarded as dead, and in fact so declared by the courts. The friend urges him to return, telling him that his heirs can be compelled to return his fortune, but he refuses.

"I have my fortune here," he says, "my wife and child. Let my heirs keep the money. It is valueless to me." The friend, being a true friend, kept the secret.

WHEN MANDY CAME TO TOWN (April 26).—In appearance he was a "Rube," but he was comfortably well off and steadily growing richer. He ran the "opery house." Then came the temptation of this rural St. Anthony, a one-night stand actress.

It must be admitted that there was some excuse for the girl. Her company had had the hardest kind of sledding. They had no money. So the girl told her troubles to the rural magnate. The rich man wept; then gave freely of his wealth, and the company moved on to the next stand.

The girl was ready to act the next season. She had an engagement and a lovely role, the only difficulty was, that it was a financial impossibility to take the troupe across the East River, unless an angel was found. So her thoughts naturally turned to the "Rube."

She invited him to the city to talk over a "wonderful opportunity." Gladly he accepted, telling his trusting wife that "important business" was to blame; but he lost the woman's note, his child picked it up, and although Mandy was very small, she was able to realize that something was wrong, and decided to do what she could to put matters right.

By the time that Mandy arrived at the New York hotel, the dinner given in honor of the "Rube" was at its height. The festivities were too much for the rural visitor, and he had dropped off asleep. He was awakened by hearing sarcastic laughter. Drowsily he opened his eyes, blinkingly he looked around. The mirth was caused by his little daughter, and these "show folks," who had seemed to him to be excellent comrades, were brutally jeering at her. It came to him with a shock of surprise, that neither he nor his daughter were properly placed, and he realized that the only reason he had been tolerated was because of his money. Grieved and indignant, he gathered his child in his arms, and left "Bohemian life" forever.

In the morning when the country wife came down stairs at dawn, she was glad to greet her husband, who, she believed, had arrived on the early morning train. She was puzzled, however, at the warmth of his embrace, and also because he had led her into the baby's room, and stood glancing at their sleeping child with new love in his eyes. For the wife did not know that Mandy went to town.

proves quite erratic and both the large parlor mirror and chandelier suffer demolition. Father then takes an intervening hand, and after due reprimand, decides that Jimmie must only shoot outdoors. With this end in view he starts to make several targets to be placed on the garden wall. In the midst of placing glue on the rear of each target, papa is called away and Jimmie is left to complete the job. Julie comes in to surprise Jimmie, but he resents her disturbance and thoughtlessly pushes her on one of his targets. Later on Jimmie spies this target in the kitchen and little realizing its location on Julie's anatomy, takes aim and penetrates the bull's eye. This starts the comedy a rolling and up it keeps with ceaseless furore.

DINANT ON THE MEUSE (April 25).—This scenic offers some of the select views of the winding picturesque Meuse river as it passes the scenic Belgian citadel of Dinant.

HELIOGABALUS, TYRANT OF ROME (April 28).—A dissolute and bloodthirsty Emperor is on the throne, and a gorgeous representation of the Roman Court with its sumptuous surroundings and kaleidoscopic colorings is portrayed. In the year 218 of the Christian era, Heliogabalus was proclaimed Emperor by the soldiers, after defeating his rival, Macrinus. His reign of nearly four years was infamous for his gluttony and unparallelel debaucheries. At the age of 14 he was invested with the royal purple, and Rome soon displayed a scene of cruelty and licentiousness, among which the most infamous of the populace became favorites of the youthful Caesar. This film depicts a few instances of the tyrant's cruelty and also his well merited and cowardly end.

One day, while attending to the Emperor's toilette, a slave makes a slight mistake, and Heliogabalus, crying out in rage, immediately condemns the poor servant to death. Falling on his knees, the unfortunate creature begs in vain for his life, and is dragged away by the soldiers and thrown as food to the lions. Next, a banquet is seen in progress at the Royal Palace, amidst the theatrical pomp and rain of flowers, the revelers are observed in convivial mood. The splendid feast ordered by the Emperor is drawing to a close when frightful roarings are heard, and the doors opening, a troop of lions bound into the hall. A panic takes place, and the stricken guests fleeing from the threatening danger, rush along the passages, madly endeavoring to find the quickest means of exit.

At length, disgusted by this reign of folly and brutality, the Pretoriaus (who were instrumental in placing Heliogabalus on the throne) resolve to make an end of the tyrant. Surrounding the palace they inform the monster that he must die. Groveling on his knees, the cowardly Heliogabalus beseeches mercy from those who but a short time before had trembled before him. His end is speedy, for they plunge their spears into the tyrant's body, and thus ends the life of one whom history has surnamed the "Sardanapalus of Rome."

RELIANCE.

A QUESTION OF EVIDENCE (April 17).—A story dealing with the elemental man of the hunting camps up in the north woods. The story opens during the idle moments of rough play and two friends, Jackson and Thompson, quarrel and part in hatred. Later the two meet at Thompson's cabin, unknown to anyone, and become reconciled. Jackson gets his gun and fishing rod and starts off through the woods for game. Thompson finding his gun disabled also hits the trail, but leaves his gun behind, carrying only his traps. Coming upon Jackson fishing he borrows his gun. While passing through some rocky part of the trail he stumbles and the gun goes off, killing him. Late in the afternoon Jackson finds his friend's body and carries it, with his discharged gun, to the camp. There the men refuse to believe his story, and openly accuse him of murder. The sheriff is notified just in time to save him from being roughly handled and the father, positive that his son is innocent, offers a reward for the real murderer. Cushman, who is up in the woods with his consumptive wife, is dead broke and on the hour that Thompson was killed heard the shot and found the body, but ran away, a prey to his cowardly fears. He finds the reward notice and resolves to pass as the murderer to secure the money for his wife. He goes to the father and pleads guilty. They both repair to the Sheriff, when word comes to the latter that young Thompson has been taken from the jail and across the lakes to be lynched. The three follow at a mad pace over water and mountains just in time to avert a real murder. The men force the real story from Cushman of his attempted sacrifice and come to the belief that Thompson really died by accident. Going to his sick wife they tell her of her husband's heroism and give her more than the reward as a fitting recompense.

LOVE IS BLIND (April 20).—Foster is a young artist with great ambitions to be taken up by society. Mrs. Hardrocks, a wealthy society widow, makes a protégé of him, with the result that he falls madly in love with her—at least so he thinks. In the same house with Foster's studio is little Betty Wilson, the daughter of the landlady. She has formed her little existence so as to live in the light of Foster's comings and goings. He is her great ideal. One day in order to complete a picture for the wealthy widow he gets Betty to pose for him. She almost faints with delight and the opportunity to be near him and wear some of his lovely property wardrobe. When the ordeal is over she manages to slip out with the finery held behind her and goes to her bare, cheerless room to further pose as a grand lady, which ends in a burst of long pent up sobs. Foster gets word that he has inherited money and becomes obsessed of the idea that now he can propose to the widow. He calls in Betty and tells her all about it and she doesn't know whether to be glad or cry. She tells him he must make his studio presentable, and they set about fixing it up, with the result that he discovers a more than great liking for little Betty. However, that is no to be considered with the opportunity arising from his marriage to the widow. He gives Betty a great armful of fine clothes to put on and tells her that when they come back from being married she must receive them. Fate cheats him, for when the widow arrives to look at the picture she has her fiance with her. Betty hearing them leave thinks the coast is clear and bounds into the room arrayed like a young woman of fashion. There she finds Foster with his head in his hands, thinking his heart broken beyond repair. She goes to him and timidly offers her sympathy. When he raises his head and sees the vision before him he forgets that there ever was a widow, society or art and realizes that his heart was in Betty's keeping all the time. On his knees he begs her forgiveness and love, and she so happy gets down on her knees and snuggles into his arms.

NESTOR.

A PAIR OF BABY SHOES (April 15).—On returning home from their individual evening's entertainment, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Darrell, an estranged couple, arrive in time to be present at the death-bed of their only child. With no mortal tie on earth, the Darrells follow to the fullest extent the vent of their own desires: clubs and wines for Richard; society and companionsuip of other men for Flora.

The baby boots, long since thrown away as valueless, eventually find their way to a rubbish can. From the rubbish can the boots go into the bag of a rag-picker; thence into the possession of a junk man, who sells them to a second-hand shoe dealer. The tiny boots are placed in the window for display. They are bought by a couple of jolly inebriates.

Mr and Mrs. Darrell have their last quarrel and divorce proceedings are the inevitable outcome. Next door to where the child died there is a wedding in progress. Old shoes and rice are thrown after the bride and groom. The two inebriates coming upon the scene, join in the sport of shoe throwing by contributing the baby boots. Among the old shoes and boots that litter the street the old servant finds and recognizes the baby boots—the wife is off to Reno and the husband is going to Europe. They meet for the last time. By an ingenious arrangement of their dead child's shoes (the old butler puts one little shoe in each of their traveling bags) a reconciliation is brought about at the eleventh hour.

HER INDIAN HERO (April 17).—The Chief's son, Silver Water, returns from college and is met at the station by the tribe. The Indians make merry to celebrate his homecoming. Hal Benton, an Easterner, rides on to ask his way to the hotel, where he is stopping with some friends, among them his fiancée, Veda Mead, and her father. Knowing that the Indian ceremonies will interest his friends, Hal obtains permission to come the next day and bring his friends. The Chief calls Morning Star, an Indian maiden, telling his son that she is to be his squaw. Silver Water is pleased with her.

The next day Hal Benton and his friends arrive. While the others inspect the camp, Veda Mead amuses herself with Silver Water and ere long is thoroughly infatuated with him, while the Indian's vanity is touched by the attentions of the society coquette, and he promises to meet her the next day. Their little tete-a-tete is cut short by the entrance of Morning Star. The next day they meet and, after coquetting with Silver Water until he forgets his Indian sweetheart, the Eastern girl gives him her calling card, upon which she writes "To my Indian Hero" and asks him to call upon her in the East.

Several months pass, and Hal Benton and Veda Mead are preparing to wed, when a letter arrives addressed to Mr. Mead from Silver Water, telling him that as he is in the East, he will do himself the honor to call upon them that evening. To Veda, who had been reading of the Indians' lives and customs after her meeting with Silver Water, the news is very terrifying. Recalling how she played with him, she fears that he may now make trouble. She goes to the veranda and sits down to think over the situation. Suddenly she sees Silver Water in full war paint and feathers coming up the steps. He sees her and advances. Touching her upon the shoulder, he beckons her to follow. She obeys. As they reach the garden he tells her of his love, reminds her of her promises when they last met and insists upon her fulfilling them now. She cries out, and her cry brings Hal. Silver Water tells Hal why he has come for Veda, and Hal agrees that she must go with him; but Silver Water is not satisfied. He throws down his knife and insists upon Hal fighting with him for the girl. At a given signal, both men start for the knife. The Indian secures it and soon kills Hal; then, throwing his blanket over the terrified Veda, he drags her off to his camp and commands her to fetch and carry and cook his meals. Veda sinks to the ground as Silver Water stalks off, but no sooner has he gone than Morning Star slips out from her tepee and, creeping down upon Veda, raises her knife to strike the girl dead. Just as the knife descends, Veda forces herself to rise, only to find herself in Hal's arms on the veranda, for the young man has been trying to awaken her to tell his sweetheart that their Indian friend, Silver Water, has arrived, and at that moment stands beside them in the most correct evening dress. At the first glance she gives him, Silver Water realizes that it would be impossible to ever win the white girl, so leaving her with Hal, he tears up her card and returns to the blanket and Morning Star, his sweetheart, before he has learned the white man's ways.

THE LOVE TRAIL (April 20).—Mrs. Brooks, a widow, has spent all her money in sending her son, Paul, to college and keeping up their splendid home in the West. She feels that it is now imperative that either Paul or her daughter, Hazel, marry wealth. She writes her son the following letter:

"Dear Son—Col. Anderson is visiting in the neighborhood. He has a charming daughter whom I hope some day will be your wife. Spend your vacation at home and bring your chum with you. He will make an excellent 'catch' for your sister.

"Your loving Mother."

Col. Anderson's daughter, Helen, is an heiress. Paul's chum, Van Allen, is also very wealthy. Paul is annoyed at his mother's scheming, but Van Allen is only amused when by accident he sees the letter. He insists upon Paul replying to her letter and saying that they will start West at once. They arrive and are met by Paul's cowboy friends. In the meanwhile, the widow's daughter has flatly refused to marry Van Allen and the Colonel's daughter is just as determined to refuse to marry Paul. The two girls quarrel over the situation and Helen, refusing to ride with the Western girl, goes off driving by herself, only to have the horse run away. Paul, on his way home from the station, sees the runaway and dashes to the rescue and the two young people are not at all displeased with each other until they arrive at the Brooks' home and Helen becomes aware of the identity of her rescuer.

The next day the Colonel and the widow try to effect a reconciliation between the four young people, without avail. However, Van Allen has an idea which, after coaxing, the young people agree to follow. This is to try and marry the Colonel and the widow, which will leave the young people free to do as they wish. The boys tell the Colonel that the widow just adores him, while the girls confide to the widow that the Colonel worships her. The widow is flattered and greatly pleased. The Colonel decides she is the one woman in the world for him. He proposes and is accepted, greatly to the joy of the young people. Later, the Colonel and widow are to be married, but now that no one cares whether they marry or not, the four young people suddenly decide that they were made for each other, and the Colonel and the widow are delighted that their match-making has not been in vain and that wedding bells will ring for six instead of for two BANGS' BURGLAR ALARM (April 23).—John Bangs is a great inventor, or thinks he is and is continually seeking for new and startling ideas. He finally discovers one in a marvelous burglar alarm, which he proceeds to place on the market. Without his being aware of it, one of his alarms is installed in his own house and he is the first one to be caught by it. It proves to be all that could be expected of a burglar alarm, but unfortunately, as it also possesses the principles of an infernal machine, it alarms the entire neighborhood and nearly wrecks his home.

THE SCHEMERS (April 27).—Mrs. Brown and Mrs. Jones meet for the first time since their schooldays and both are delighted to renew their former happy friendship. Mrs. Brown has a marriageable daughter, Mabel, and Mrs. Jones has an eligible son, Tom. Mabel and Tom have never met, nor have they any desire to form each other's acquaintance. The two mothers, however, have very different ideas and decide that a marriage between their children would make a highly desirable and altogether lovely adjustment of their affairs. Then the trouble begins. Mabel, through a clever ruse, convinces Tom that she is even more unsuitable for a wife than he at first suspected and his consequent actions lead to a dreadful row between all parties concerned. All too late, Mabel discovers that she really does love Tom and is heart-broken because she cannot call him back. In short, everything between the two houses goes to smash. Time, however, heals all wounds and two years later, Mabel is enabled, through another ruse, to bring Tom to her side again and this time his eagerness to propose to her is only equalled by her readiness to accept his proposal, and Mrs. Brown and Mrs. Jones are made happy at last.

AN EMBARRASSING PURCHASE (April 19).—The startling adventures of Bill whilst endeavoring to reach home safely with a nice new bath tub he has purchased are even more arduous and varied than those of any story book hero. As a laughter maker, this film is entirely without a peer.

CHING-CHANG IN PARIS (April 19).—A very funny Lux Comic Film dealing with the amusing adventures of Ching-Chang, a Chinaman, who went to see the sights in Paris. He is caught by two scheming servants, who lets one of their employer's rooms to him. Planning to make money out of their employer's absence, the servants make things very comfortable for Ching-Chang. The unexpected return of the owner of the house puts a different light upon the matter and Ching-Chang has a lively time.

SOLAX.

THE SEWER (April 24).—Herbert Moore is the leader of a gang of crooks. He leads by sheer force of mentality, while his pal, Burley Butts, leads by brutal force. Between them they have a plan to rob Mr. Stanhope, a noted philanthropist, on whom Moore has been spying. For their ill purposes they use little Oliver, an unwilling pupil of Butts. On a dark night they embark on their venture.

Gripping events succeed each other in rapid succession. Oliver enters the house. He makes his way, with a bullseye lantern—here we have a remarkable light effect—a sudden flash, the lights go up, and little Oliver faces the muzzle of a revolver. Mr. Stanhope is surprised to see the youthful criminal. He quizzes him. But little Oliver cries and tells his story. Stanhope is moved by the boy's tale. In taking out his handkerchief to dry his eyes, Oliver drops a silver half-dollar. Mr. Stanhope attempts to return it to Oliver but the child brushes it away and tells him to keep it, informing Stanhope that the silver half-dollar is the insignia of the gang and that it can open in the middle and be used in an emergency as a saw with which the user may cut rope, wire or glass. Stanhope's interest is aroused, and he places the little souvenir in his pocket. Later this piece of metal is one of the means of saving his life. Oliver then pleads to be let free, and Stanhope allows him to go, after taking an oath that he will not attempt to steal again.

This attempt failing, the gang sets a trap for Stanhope, but little Oliver passes a note and key to his benefactor when the thugs lower him into a vault. When Stanhope finds himself in the narrow vault, he struggles hard to free himself from the bonds which almost cut to the bones. He frees himself sufficientlv to get the silver half-dallor, which he now puts to good use. After hours of effort he breaks his bonds. He tries to straighten himself and then finds the heavy key and the note in his coat pocket.

He is scarcely able to read the instructions. The greenish light gives him the appearance of a man risen from the dead. Gradually his dulled mind absorbs the portent of the note. He desperately feels for the secret keyhole. His search is not in vain. Presently, he swings back the granite door and he is confronted with a vista of the city's filth and slime. He crawls through the outlet and makes his way through the sewer channels. The stench from stagnant sewerage pools, cess-pool waste, mud and dirt, nearly suffocates him. But on and on he struggles, up to his knees through this liquid filth. Even an attack by a horde of sewer rats does not swerve him from his path. He fights the rodents off and they scamper. At last, weary and exhausted, he finds his way to the sewerage main, a ladder leading to a manhole giving entrance to the street.

Bespattered with mud and filth, dishevelled and bedraggled, he rushes through the streets and to the police station. The gang is soon surprised by big Colt six-shooters and little Oliver and his brother find a home in Mr. Stanhope's happy household.

BILLY'S INSOMNIA (April 26).—Billy has a sleepless spell and is told by his doctors that he is going to suffer from absolute inability to sleep for an indefinite period. This situation does not appall Billy. However, his friends all sympathize with him, and are magnaminous with advice and remedies. Billy turns night into day and sets a pace that brings him into great prominence, and is looked upon as a great disturber of peace and quiet. At last his case comes to the notice of a crabbed and eccentric millionaire, who surrounded himself with a heavy guard, and not trusting the banks with his money, kept watch on it himself. He sends for Billy and offers him a position of watchman. Although this is a good chance to materialize something from his affliction, Billy is about to brush this offer aside, but the millionaire, determined to have Billy's services at any cost, offers his charming daughter to Billy in marriage, and Billy is thus persuaded. This change soon cures Billy of his insomnia and the millionaire finds that he has made a bad bargain.

AMERICAN.

HER MOUNTAIN HOME (April 25).—Ralph Kennington, dying of thirst in the alkali dust of the desert, staggered forward until exhaustion stares him in his face. Instinctively his hand clutched at the pebbles when lo! to his astonished gaze a dull gellow glow announced the magic word, "Gold!" James Raleigh found him there.

Ralph Kennington, recovered, had gone to live with his new-found pal, Jim Raleigh. The two became fast friends and were the first to hurry back to the gold field. Among those who joined that first mad rush to the gold fields was old man Hadley and his daughter Marguerite. Years of unsuccessful mining had greatly impoverished his fortune and health, so when at last he found his claim rich beyond his dreams, the poor old miner's heart gave away, leaving pretty Marguerite without a protector. Ralph and James took her in and for some months everything moved smoothly. Both men fell deeply in love with their young housekeeper. James made love to her in his bold way, pleading that she run away with him. But Ralph pursued different methods. Without saying a word to anyone of his intentions, Ralph built on the mountain side, a magnificent home, biding his time until it should be finished when he would ask her to be its mistress.

Jim made better headway. The two planned an elopement and left suddenly one day with only a little note to explain their disappearance. Ralph found it. Heartbroken he strolled aimlessly to town. In the meantime the eloping couple stopped at a neighboring store before boarding the stage for their journey. Marguerite went inside while Jim waited. When she again emerged her horror-stricken eyes saw Jim tightly clasping the form of a strange young woman, who evidently had just reached town from the East. Jim had no thought of Marguerite. With his former love he sauntered carelessly down the street. Then Ralph appeared, and, taking in the situation at a glance, put his arm about the tearful Marguerite and led her to the new home on the mountain-side.

THE PENSIONERS (April 29).—Charles Bramwell, aged 65, was a retired army officer bearing the rank of captain. In his old age he had nothing on which to live, save his quarterly pension, and living was high in California. But the captain had two sons: Dick, quick, clear-thinking, a popular young fellow with both men and women, and Will, slower witted, careless, lazy and indifferent.

One day a message came while the captain sat under the trees in his yard. The message was short and addressed from a legal firm in the East. It read: "As per the last will and testament of your late friend, Col. W. A. Reiggs, we are sending to your care his two daughters in accordance with your understanding."

The daughters arrived. Clarice proved haughty indifferent to others and quarrelsome. Madge, on the contrary, soon showed herself a kind and thoughtful girl and in many ways the direct antithesis of her sister. Curiously enough, Dick found himself drawn strongly toward Clarice.

But a change was coming over Will. He no longer neglected to carry water, bring the fire-wood and do the chores about the house. There grew up a comradeship between him and Madge, brought about, no doubt, through the fact that all the household work was thrown upon their shoulders. Then a day came when neither Clarice or Dick could be found. Finally, the aged mother discovered a note which explained the mad infatuation and brought the sorrowful news that the family could expect nothing more from Dick or Clarice. But Will, with one arm about his mother's shoulder and the other carressingly thrown around Madge, assured her that the black sheep had turned white and that thenceforth he would assume his brother's place.

MAJESTIC.

DOWN AND OUT (April 21).—Thomas Walton, old-time tragedian, and Leonard Williams, modern light comedian, are room-mates in a theatrical boarding house. They are in arrears in their board and are forced to vacate and seek a cheap attic room. Leonard reads an advertisement for a valet, and goes forth to apply for the position. He is promptly engaged by a prosperous-looking gentleman named Thomas, and his first duty is to take out a suit of clothes to have it pressed. After this errand he rushes to the attic to tell Walton of his good fortune.

He finds the tragedian in a predicament. A letter has followed him from the boarding house, telling him to apply for an engagement, at a certain manager's office, and to come properly dressed for a society drama, in order to make a good impression. Walton's clothes hardly "look the part." A brilliant idea occurs to the newly engaged valet, and he rushes to the tailor, brings back his employer's clothes, and lends them to his friend. Thus arrayed the tragedian presents himself at the manager's office, and that person proves to be no other than Thomas, the employer of Leonard. Thomas finds his name in the lining of the coat, and detains the embarrassed actor, while he sends for his new valet.

When Leonard arrives nothing is possible but confession. The manager's heart is touched by the story, and he engages the tragedian. It is then suggested that the valet, too, is an actor, and, after some demur, Thomas gives Leonard a contract. The two friends gleefully desert their attic room, and return to the boarding house.

THE INSTALLMENT PLAN (April 23).—Edwin Jones has social aspirations, but little money. When he receives word that a wealthy French count is going to present a letter of introduction to him, he conceives the idea of fitting up his drawing-room, on the installment plan, in order to make an impression. Incidentally he thinks his daughter, Ethel, may make an impression on the nobleman. All this meets with the disapproval of Frank Wesley, a young man favored by Ethel, but not by her parents. Frank has no great wealth or social position, but is blessed with an active brain. A month passes, the drawing-room is beautifully furnished, the count has reached our shores, and announced that he will call.

Frank repairs to the installment house and meets Bill Mason, a rough and energetic furniture mover, who has been left in charge, and reminds him that the second installment on Jones' furniture has not been paid. Bill promptly goes and removes the fittings and furniture of the drawing-room, despite the protests of the family. When the count presents himself he is not admitted to the house. Edwin Jones and wife are having bitter thoughts in their empty drawing-room, but Ethel is pleased.

Jones now visits Bill, and, unable to pay the full installment, bribes him to return the furniture. [illegible] of this, goes to Bill and gives him a larger bribe to take the furniture away again. Meanwhile the count has been informed that the family was out, at the time of his first visit. He has come again, and is showing his devotion to Ethel, who has made the expected impression. Bill and his assistant enter, and jerk the furniture away, to the astonishment of the count, and the dismay of the family.

Despair sharpens Jones' wits, and he decides to furnish the room himself. With the aid of tools he converts some boxes and barrels into the form of chairs and tables, and these, covered with draperies, make very good substitutes. Frank views this with chagrin, but when the family goes, he takes Jones' saw, cuts the chairs and table nearly in two, and puts them back in their former positions.

Jones informs the count that a horrid mistake has been made, and, despite the strange customs of this country, the nobleman calls again. He is impressed by the beauty of the new furniture, and more so by that of the daughter of the house. Jones and wife discreetly withdraw. The count turns devotedly to Ethel. He leans gracefully against a table which collapses. He recovers himself with difficulty, and Ethel begs him to be seated. Down goes the chair, and when the flustered count throws himself into another, he makes a final crash to the floor amidst the ruined furniture.

Rising to his feet the count departs, angrily and finally. Frank enters at this embarrassing moment. He appeals to Jones, and says that if he gets Ethel, Jones will get the furniture, and the father decides that an American husband will, after all, be better for his daughter. The incident is closed by Bill and his assistants once more restoring the installment plan furniture to the drawing-room.

BEAUTY AND THE BEAST (April 18).—She was beautiful. Her eyes were the koi-i-noor, her hair a wealth of golden colors, a mass of soft, strong fetters that bound the hearts of men and made their minds dream and hunger and hope and despair. Her face was fate for men, her soul their destiny. He was homely.

They met. She may have been amused or amazed, surprised or startled or merely curious in a woman's way; she may have been attracted through the mystic law of contrast, or something else that we can only describe by "something else"—but she was drawn to him.

They married. The newspapers called them "Beauty and the Beast." Perhaps it hurt his masculinity a little; we are certain it pleased her.

Then things changed a little bit. She was a woman, a young woman, a beautiful young woman who knew it; and he had a handsome friend. He noticed that she was tired, and he left her free. His friend was handsome.

He ran for office, lived in the fight to forget, but the scandal cost him the election. So he forgot God. A long, long time afterwards, as time is measured by suffering, he received a note from his friend asking forgiveness. Those who cannot forget forgive, so he joined his friend and together they found riches but missed happiness. He read a personal in a newspaper one day, and this was the message: "Will beast forgive beauty and come back to her and the baby?"

Did he go back? Well—love's a mighty funny proposition!

WHILE WEDDING BELLS RING OUT (April 21).—She was just a little stenographer, and the son of her employer took a liking to her. At her home he met her sister. Let's call them Marion and Ethel. Marion was a better prize than the other, but the wealthy boy was a kid, and the life about him had been so superficial and artificial that he saw only what lay on the surface, and on the surface the other was more desirable. Both women loved him, you know, and one was due to make the sacrifice. That one—you've guessed it—was Marion.

Remember our telling you they were poor girls? Well, Marion wanted her sister to dress as became the sweetheart of a wealthy man. There is no doubt in our minds that she would have chosen an honest way of obtaining the money if it was presented to her, but it wasn't, so the devil won. She took the money from the safe.

The girl looked beautiful in the fine clothes, and in the other's joy Marion forgot how they were obtained. But she was reminded. Meantime, the marriage date was set.

Bad things sometimes happen the very worst time. The theft was disclosed on the very day of the wedding. She pleaded with the detective not to tell the sordid truth until after the ceremony. And for some strange reason he promised.

There's an end to everything. What do you think, but it was found that the boy's father, her employer, was in love with her. Yop, we agree with you God made a funny world!

ECLAIR.

A GENEROUS PARDON (April 21).—Notwithstanding the opposition of her brother Pepito, Eliane goes to the entertainment, where she hopes to find her bethrothed Pedro. The latter, true to Eliane, has repulsed the advances of the beautiful Paquita, who, in spite, goes to inform Eliane's brother of the meeting. In fact, while the dance is going on merrily, he notices the young couple seemingly very happy over their meeting. Filled with rage, Eliane's brother provokes Pedro and compels him to fight. A rapid fight takes place; Pepito falls by accident in an excavation and is hurt mortally. Eliane, although she understands her bethrothed's innocence, does not see fit to marry the involuntary author of her brother's death, and a painful separation takes place. In the meanwhile, Pepito sees that he is dying; at the last moment he realizes his mistake, and calling to his bed the young couple, whom he wanted to separate, he unites them and dies happy, having redeemed his past injustice.

LEGEND OF SLEEPY HOLLOW (April 23).—Here is the heart-rending narrative of Ichabod Crane, the schoolmaster of Sleepy Hollow, and his strenuous courtship—the quilting bee—the village dance—the bragging of Ichabod and the true love of Katrina and Brown Bones—and finally the merry prank by which Ichabod is pursued by the Headless Horseman—with a pumpkin lantern in his hand.

OH! YOU RAGTIME (April 18).—This is the story of a great musician who tries out a popular rag-time classic with such telling effect that he nearly puts the entire neighborhood out of commission. Business men, laborers, pretty girls, domestics, tradesmen fall victims to the magic power of the melody with a droll effect which will almost take your audiences off their feet!

THE EASTER BONNET (April 25).—Dora, a pretty milliner, longs to own an Easter bonnet for sale in the shop where she works. Agnes Brown, a haughty heiress, buys it, however, and the milliner makes a duplicate, to wear, while the other is sent to the wrong house. She is accused of theft—and it is in the extrication of the poor girl from her troubles by Jack Barlow, a wealthy young lawyer, engaged to Agnes that the romance develops. It is the story of a rich girl who loses her sweetheart by her disdainfulness and conceit.

REPUBLIC.

THE AVERTED STEP (April 23).—James Willis, a wealthy manufacturer, is in love with one of his employees. He proposes to Nell and she accepts her employer's offer.

Some years later Willis's business has caused him considerable worry and has compelled him to neglect his wife. She resents his neglect and decides to obtain enjoyment elsewhere. The husband 'phones from the office and informs her that a big business deal will detain him at the office. Regardless of the cause of his delay, the wife goes out and visits a girl friend. While there she notices a photograph of a handsome young man. She is immediately interested in him and questions her friend. She begs for the photo, which is given her. Before Nell leaves, the original of the photo arrives and she is introduced to him.

Nell goes home and thinks of the young man. As she falls asleep, the maid enters, announcing the young man. She tells the maid to admit him and as soon as the maid exits, the young man slowly comes up from behind the armchair, in which the wife is seated. He has the facial appearance of the devil, attired in evening clothes. The wife is astounded at his sudden appearance. The stranger overcomes her fears and finally persuades her to go out with him. They visit various places of amusement. They return to her home. The husband, returning home, overhears the stranger's avowal of love and seeing his wife in the man's arms, decides to avenge his honor. He gets possession of a revolver, interrupts the couple, a quarrel ensues, the husband fires at the stranger. Both husband and wife stand spellbound as the stranger disappears in a cloud of smoke and the "devil" stands in his place, grinning hideously at them.

The light fades out and when it comes up again the wife starts from the chair and realizes it was nothing but a horrible dream. The husband, in the meantime, returns home and tells his wife that he has been successful in putting the deal through, which will mean a trip abroad. The wife realizes how much her husband's love means and she is thankful that the step she was about to take was averted by a horrible dream.

THE CLAIM JUMPER (April 27).—Jack Wilson and Bill Carter are both in love with Mary, the daughter of the recorder of claims. The recorder informs them that he will not consider either of them as a suitor for his daughter until they have staked a paying claim.

Jack and Bill both start on a prospecting trip and Jack, realizing that Bill is the better miner, decides to follow and watch Bill. Bill stakes a claim and works same. He examines the nuggets and discovers that his claim shows four dollars to the pan. Jack, who has been covertly watching Bill, sees this and when Bill leaves the claim, Jack restakes it.

Bill starts for the recorder's office. Jack also gets his team ready and follows Bill. Bill is seen coming along the trail when his lead dog strikes a big snow drift and tries to get to the beaten trail. The sled, with Bill and the dogs, crash over the drift. Jack comes on the scene and assists Bill to his feet but Bill has an injured ankle and is unable to stand. Jack leaves Bill to secure his dogs. Jack gets Bill's dogs and harnesses them to Bill's sled, placing his own lighter sled inside of Bill's. He picks up the dog whip and threatens Bill, telling him that he is going to have the claim recorded and that Bill cannot follow as he has no sled. Bill gets on the blanket and catches hold of Jack's dogs, urging them on, being dragged over the snow. Jack, looking back, sees Bill following and urges on the dogs, but Bill catches up with and passes Jack, reaching the recorder's just in advance of Jack. Mary is there and meets Bill, assisting him into the cabin. The claim is recorded and Bill and Mary decide to work it together.

“ELECTRA”

PINK LABEL CARBONS

Improve Your Projection

MORE LIGHT. The light from “ELECTRA” PINK LABEL CARBONS is from 10 to 25 per cent. stronger. Gives a brighter, steadier, whiter light than any other carbon made.

LESS COST. The fact that “ELECTRA” PINK LABEL CARBONS burn longest, are most uniform and leave the least dust, makes them the most economical carbons on the market. With this high quality of light you are in a position to produce the highest quality of pictures.

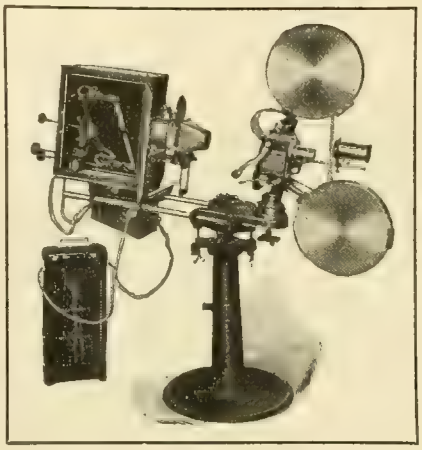
WHAT YOU GET!



AFTER you have listened to all the big talk of other manufacturers—After all is said and done—What interests you most when you select a machine is what you get.

We claim—and we can prove it—that in the MOTIOGRAPH, at $225.00, you get more real value than you can obtain in any other machine on earth, at the price.

Gears of solid steel and each tooth cut on our own machines—Bushings of phosphor-bronze and made in our own plant—Quality of material and workmanship unexcelled.

We could cut down our cost $50.00 and no one but an expert would know it—That doesn't mean it wouldn't be found out later on, for it would be, and "later-on" is not a good time to find out things about the machine you buy. Find it out before you buy.

It is a fact—we could cut the heart right out of the MOTIOGRAPH and no one could tell it by simply looking at the machine. It would still look handsome and efficient but it wouldn't have the stuff in it, the material and workmanship, the qualities that have forced its recognition on the public as the one and only machine of standard quality.

The 1912 MOTIOGRAPH is worth seeing, worth studying and worth buying—Made in various equipments and range in price of $225.00 to $350.00—Send for catalog.

THE FOOS

Direct connected special Electric Engines operating on Gas, Gasoline, Oil and other low priced liquid fuels

Will make current for your machines, fans and lights—at a cost so low that you can save your entire original investment in a short time—and do it so well right in your own building that your patrons won't know there is an engine around.

Behind a money-saving, money-making engine, we have the facts to prove higher quality of service at a cost 50 to 75 per cent. lower than your present expense for electric current. An actual example of such a plant is a theater operated by an 11 H.P. for several years and to which has been added recently another of 15 H.P.—saving $80 a month on the installation. The Central Station service cost at this theater was $100 a month. The two Foos Engines have been operating at an expense of only $20 a month—saving every year $960. Furthermore, since the Foos Engines were installed, the patrons of this theater are better satisfied. The pictures are better and the current never fails when it is wanted. It gives a better quality of light and does it all without the slightest odor, noise or vibration.

Foos Special Electric Plants are used in many moving picture theaters. The cost of installation is reasonable. They are absolutely fireproof and can be operated without extra assistance. These plants are in no sense experimental. Satisfactory and profitable operation are absolutely assured by the reputation of Foos Engines. Send for Special Electric Bulletin S.E.-98, and ask for all the data you want on plants of this character.

"HALLBERG D.C.ECONOMIZER"

Sandusky, Ohio, Jan. 15, 1909.

Dear Sir:

Your Economizer for 550-volt direct current gives a better light, no heat, and a saving of $49.98 in 26 days' use. Before I changed from a rheostat, my bill was $71.04, and now it is $21.06.

(Signed) CHAS. REARK,
Prop. Theatorium.

His Letter of Three Years Ago Shows a Saving of $50 a Month. Three Years Later After "The Hallberg" Has Saved Him Nearly $2,000, He Convinces You Again That the Economizer Is as Good as the Day It Was Put In, and It Cost Him Less Than $300 to Install.

After 3 years' use of one of your D. C. Economizers for 550 volts, have to say that I would not part with it if I could not replace it with another "HALLBERG." It has been a great saver for me. Yours truly,

CHAS REARK, Mgr. Theatorium, Sandusky, O.

PHILLIP AGAIN PROPOSES TO ELIZABETH

TRUE 'TILL DEATH

Between Phillip and Paul, Elizabeth chooses Paul for her husband and is blessed with a happiness she had never known. The Civil War calls Paul from his wife and child never to be returned. He expires on the battle-field in the arms of his friend Phillip. Twenty-five years later Phillip again proposes, but is refused because the sacred memory of her dear husband is never lost to Elizabeth. A mask ball to which her grandchildren wear the costumes she and Paul had once worn revive sweet memories. She has a vision of Paul once more leading her through a graceful dance, and in that vision comes—death.

MISS ARABELLA SNAITH

Florida Funnyfilm

RELEASED FRIDAY, MAY 3d

This is a comedy that makes you roar and isn't slapstick. There CAN be such comedy—we've proved it before. This story of the adventures of the man who wrote a "best seller" is refined, first and last. And said adventures ARE ludicrous—they bring him a wife and they lose him one! Desirable funny film for discriminating audiences.

"ALKALI" IKE In the Greatest Western Comedy-Riot Ever Made! THIS WEEK!

Released Tuesday, April 23rd

"'ALKALI' IKE'S BOARDING HOUSE"

Who, among film-fans, doesn't know "Alkali" Ike of Snakeville? Remember "Alkali" Ike's Auto, the famous Western comedy that swept the photoplay world with tidal waves of laughter? Well, here's one still funnier—and that's saying a lot when the comic-reputation of "Alkali" is considered! A great big scream for 1,000 joy-feet. Beg for it, Mr. Show-man!

Released Thursday, April 25th

"THE DOCTOR"

Have you felt that insidious grip of Spring ennui yet? Are you fast in its clutches with a dull head, heavy eyes and a general feeling of "What's the use of anything?" Well, you just breeze into the nearest theatre, see "THE DOCTOR," and "she'll" give you some joy-pills that will put you back in the two-year-old class. Some picture, this!

Released Friday, April 26th

"OUR NEIGHBOR'S WIFE"

After you have seen "THE DOCTOR" you'll feel so good you'll go right back and take in this third big comedy feature for the week and laugh yourself sick again. Real, live, complex, comic situations entwined about a plot that will make even the married men roar. That's going some, you know!

Released Saturday, April 27th

"THE INDIAN AND THE CHILD"

One of the greatest Western dramatic subjects of the month. A plot abounding in grim, gripping, tense thrills, yet beautiful in its undercurrent of pathos that appeals to us all. Mr. G. M. Anderson's portrayal of the "Indian" is one of the finest character-studies this wonderful pantomimist has yet given you. Remember the date, April 27th!

"COMING AMERICANS"

"HER MOUNTAIN HOME"

(Release Thurs., Apr. 25. Len. 1000 ft.)

Gold! You know the meaning of that magic word out West. A young man, dying of thirst in the desert, is found by another traveler just when he is about to die and just after he has discovered a bonanza. The two become friends, join the rush of settlers and, through an odd turn of fate, become protectors of a dainty Western girl. Both loved her, and while one built a home the other eloped with her. And then the denouement—a strong "Western" rich in melodramatic values.

"THE PENSIONERS"

(Release Mon., Apr. 29. Len. 1,000 ft.)

Old man Hathaway and his wife were pensioners. Two sons they had—one lazy and indifferent, the other active and successful. The pensioner is given care of two daughters who differ in temperament quite as much as the brothers. There follows interesting complications—rapid-fire change of plot—making a thoroughly delightful 1,000 feet of picture.

"The Post Telegrapher"

Stupendous Military Production

"101" BISON HEAD LINER

TWO REELS

Ready for Shipment on May 1.

Cyclonic Presentation of War—Tremendous Sensational Scenes

A detachment of cavalry is caught in the Indians' "circle of death," and, fighting to the last gasp, all are exterminated. The post telegrapher, left for dead in the running fight, revives and drags himself to the telegraph wire, which he taps and sends a plea for help to the fort. The troops gallop madly to the scene, their coming being heralded by Indian scouts with smoke signals on hilltops. The Indians decoy the troops to the village by the use of dummies with headdresses, while they make a detour and attack the small garrison at the fort. Thrilling scenes are shown as the hordes of Indians batter down the stockade and endeavor to destroy the whites before the return of the troops, who are rushing back at breakneck speed. The final battle is ended by a sensational hand to hand conflict and a whirlwind cavalry charge. Through the picture runs a beautiful love story, showing the bravery of a girl who rescues the post telegrapher from the very jaws of death and carries him to safety on her horse.

The MAJESTIC

Announces Four of the Very Best Pictures Ever Produced by This Company—Two High-Class Comedies and Two Strong Dramas.

DEMAND THESE PICTURES

SUNDAY, APRIL 28th—"BOYS," another splendid comedy; a widower with a son marries a widow with a son, and these two boys do not approve of the marriage, and proceed to make things lively for the parents—a laugh from start to finish.

TUESDAY, APRIL 30th—"THE SILENT CALL," a powerful dramatic picture, showing the trials of the telephone operator in a large hotel and the important part the switchboard plays in the picture; most wonderful lighting effects.

SUNDAY, MAY 5th—"HIS WEDDING DAY," another comedy. A prospective bridegroom is entertained by his bachelor friends the night before the wedding; he over-sleeps and reaches the prospective bride three hours late, after some of the funniest experiences ever seen in pictures.

TUESDAY, MAY 7th—"REDEEMED," a strong drama. Jeanne, the wife of a Frenchman, loses her baby and husband on the same day, goes to Paris and at once is the idol of the studios. Hardened by her surroundings, she forgets her gentle feelings, but is finally redeemed by the tender touch of a friend's baby.

APRIL 9th—"A WARRIOR BOLD" — Farce Comedy.
14th—"THE RETURN OF LIFE"—Comedy Drama.
16th—"NOT ON THE PROGRAMME"—Comedy Drama.
21st—"DOWN AND OUT"—Feature Comedy.
23rd—"THE INSTALLMENT PLAN"—Farce Comedy.

Facts and Comments

THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD wishes to express its sincerest appreciation of the many tributes, paid to the late founder of this paper in the columns of all our esteemed contemporaries interested in motion pictures. Their praise of the founder's work and character was in every sense of the word a personal tribute to his memory. It was he who had helped to create that "era of good feeling," which at present pervades the world of moving pictures. Let us hope it will endure for many years to come.

AN enterprising gentleman, writing from Vicksburg, Miss., has made us a handsome offer, which we must decline with thanks. He wants us to portray in moving pictures the adventures of a "young man" whose adventurous career has filled our correspondent with considerable enthusiasm. We learn from him, that this proposed hero "at the age of sixteen turned out to be a bandate in North Mississippi Valley," that he was in due course arrested, broke jail and "aluded the possy by getting in a tree top, turning out thirty negroes." It seems that this young man has since reformed, is married and has a good reputation. The best thing for this young man is to keep on earning a good reputation and keep his former exploits out of the moving pictures. The best thing for our correspondent is to read THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD every week and learn that the day of that sort of picture has passed, never to return.

WE print in another part of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD a letter from a Protestant clergyman, who complains that many so-called religious pictures are unfair and untrue and place his religion in a false light. The position of this paper in regard to religious pictures is well known. On more than one occasion we have protested with all the vigor at our command against the "sectarian film." We know of scores of so-called religious pictures evolved by directors who are absolutely ignorant of the subjects which they attempt to treat. At some future day we are going to try as far as lies in our power to stop this offensive practice by analyzing some of the horrible renditions in detail. The pictures must command the respect of the educated as well as of the ignorant. In the meantime we would advise the complaining clergyman to avoid the mistake of making indefinite and indiscriminate charges. He must name the offensive picture and point out its faults, otherwise he cannot expect criticism to bear fruit. A critic to be useful must be specific. Name the pictures or stop criticizing.

IT is well for every manager and exhibitor to have a "house policy" and stick to it, but there are exceptions. A man who knew and cared more about vaudeville than about pictures had to listen to many complaints from patrons who urged him to drop "vaudeville and improve the quantity and quality of his pictures." Of course the patrons did not use this language exactly, but that was what they meant and a wise manager would have understood them and acted accordingly. This particular manager said in speaking of these complaining patrons that he would really like to oblige them, but a compliance with their suggestions would mean a change in the "policy of the house" and changing the "policy of the house" was out of the question. You might as well have asked him to hurl his favorite child into the surging main. He continued his "policy." A short while after his patronage showed increasing losses, but, noble captain that he was, he stuck to his "policy" like the commander to the sinking ship. Presently another house opened in the neighborhood, showing pictures two to twelve days old and no vaudeville. The new house had a smaller seating capacity, was not as well equipped and not quite so well located. Nevertheless it grew in popularity, while the house with the fixed and immovable policy was going down, down, down. The owner of the theater then removed the manager and his "policy." In putting in a new manager the owner carefully examined him as to any "fixed policies" concealed about his person and being satisfied that he was not suffering from an excess of solid ivory between the temples told him to follow just this one policy: "Please the patrons and get the money." The moment a man prefers his policy above the plain demands of his audience he ought to bid adieu to the amusement business and try to lose his money in some other way.

WE greatly admire the aims and ambitions of those producers who turn their attention to historical pictures. If these pictures are to-day in the main crude and incorrect we need not give up hope of better things in the future. We know that many men and women high in the educational councils of the nation are profoundly interested in the subject of historical pictures. They are convinced of the superior appeal of the picture to the child's perceptive and retentive powers and are watching our so-called historical pictures with a keenly critical eye. It seems to us a duty to voice their criticism of one or two recent historical pictures. Historical pictures must be fairly accurate and true in all essentials. There is in history much debatable ground and the same freedom ,which is allowed to the writer of an historical novel, must be permitted to the maker of an historical picture. There are, however, distinct limits to this liberty and an overstepping of them is fatal to the educational value of the picture. The picture must not only render a good portrayal of costumes, but must show the characters and the facts at least in the light of the greatest probability.

With many excellent points in their favor, both the pictures, "Cardinal Wolsey" and "Washington Crossing the Delaware," suffer from the defect of historical inaccuracies, the former being in that respect of good deal worse than the latter. After looking at "Cardinal Wolsey" twice and with every desire to appreciate the praiseworthy parts, such as the historically correct appearance of Henry VIII, we are forced to say, that the picture is historically out of focus. Cardinal Wolsey never excommunicated Henry VIII, he never was the friend of Queen Catherine, but on the contrary, according to all accounts, was her enemy. So he never accepted any comfort from him, but resented the offer of it more or less fiercely. It seemed very odd that, after painting a Wolsey totally at variance with the Shakespearian character, the picture concludes with the well-known Shapespearian quotation: "If I had served," etc. Anne Boleyn was lively, even frivolous and full of coquetry in history, while in the picture she is altogether a sad looking young person, more calculated by her appearance to cool rather than inflame the royal concupiscence. We say nothing of minor faults, for these are perhaps atoned for by the many meritorious points of the film. In the reel "Washington Crossing the Delaware" a serious departure from historical accuracy lies in the capture of the Hessians and the surrender of their general (called Rall in the memorial tablets in Trenton, but sometimes also mentioned as Rahl), all of which takes place in a banqueting hall. As a matter of fact, it all took place upon the streets of Trenton. We make this criticism, which we hope will be taken in the spirit in which we offer it, because historical moving pictures are of importance and worthy of and indeed calling for a detailed and extended review. It hurts the friend of the industry to have men of education and a working knowledge of history dismiss cinematographic reproductions of historic subjects with the sneering remark: "Oh, what can you expect. They are just moving pictures."

THE Dickens centenary has been so finely celebrated in motion pictures by the reproduction of many of the noveltists best works it is not unreasonable to hope that the coming centenary of Robert Browning may find similar cinematographic tribute. We all remember the splendid film "Pippa Passes" and more recently "The Blot on the 'Scutcheon." The works of Browning afford magnificent material for a competent film maker. Mediocrity in any respect, whether of brains or equipment would be fatal to an attempt to reproduce the pictures, that first moved in the brains of Browning. Browning not only preaches a convincing gospel of optimism but abounds in the striking and the unusual, at times not only defying but overwhelming conventionalities. The latter feature alone ought to recommend his works to the competent director, who believes in the value of originality. The gravest danger to the motion picture and one which is always present is the danger of monotony.

IN MEMORY OF JAMES P. CHALMERS.

Pathe's Weekly Nos. 16 and 17 will be of special interest to all who are interested in motion pictures. No. 16 shows the chief events of the exhibitors' convention at Dayton, O. In the group of exhibitors and moving picture men arrayed in front of the building of the National Cash Register Company is a living likeness of the late editor and founder of the Moving Picture World, Mr. James P. Chalmers. He is seen in about the center of a large group busy with his camera, his face lighted up with his characteristic smile.

The Weekly No. 17 shows the funeral of Mr. Chalmers at Kensico. To have the knowledge of his lifework thus brought before all the millions who are "readers" of Pathe's cinematographic journal is a singularly fitting tribute to the memory of the man, whose life was devoted to the great invention. The Pathes have not only rendered a service to their millions of "readers" but have in a most tactful and effective way shown their recognition of Mr. Chalmers' tireless zeal for the honor and prosperity of the motion picture.

FRANK POWELL JOINS POWERS.

Mr. Frank Powell, the well-known director, who for the past two and a half years has been identified with the American Biograph Company, began work with the Powers Motion Picture Company on April 16th. There were a number of firms bidding for his services, but the Powers Company secured him quickly while the others were thinking.

The Social Uses of the Moving Picture

By W. Stephen Bush

THE value of the moving picture as a means of agitating for the betterment of social conditions is self-evident. Nothing affects us more powerfully than the truth when it is preached in pictures. Less than a hundred years ago our social system was full of grave wrongs and abuses, which were eventually remedied and destroyed by pictures, cartoons and descriptions. The pen-picture, even when drawn by a masterhand, can never be as quickly and as universally convincing as the picture which derives its realism from the fact that it moves.

Abuses and wrongs cannot live except in darkness. The moment we throw a strong enough light on a real social wrong half the battle is won. A striking illustration of this fact was afforded recently during the last session of the New York Legislature. It appears that several efforts had been made to obtain an appropriation for shelter for poor blind children. The legislators who, no doubt, possessed the same sympathy for suffering that every human being feels, neglected to act in the matter; not out of callous indifference but because the rush of business and their own individual affairs claimed their attention. One day a little blind child suffering from the want of such a shelter was placed beside the presiding officer of the Senate. The sight so affected the legislators that the appropriation was voted at once without a dissenting voice.

Any motion picture portraying deplorable social conditions is therefore an agent for good. Some of the best known film makers of our country have given us pictures dealing with social evils and making a strong appeal for redress and reform. The Biograph, Selig, Vitagraph and notably the Edison studios deserve credit for their efforts along these lines.

The boldest, most timely and most effective appeal for the stamping out of the cruelest of all social abuses has been made in a two-reel production by the Thanhouser Company. The pictures are based on the touching poem of Elizabeth Barrett Browning entitled, "The Cry of the Children." More than two generations have passed away since the noble poetess told of the "children weeping ere the sorrow comes with years."

Since that time great efforts have been made by many good men and women to stop this evil. We are ashamed to say that the agitation against child labor has been far more successful in other civilized countries than in our own. For more than half a century all attempts to remedy the evil in the cotton mills of the South, where it appears in its most hideous shape, have been unavailing.

After an agitation lasting from the period of reconstruction to the present day, the best that has been accomplished was done by the present Congress. A law has now been passed, establishing a Federal Bureau, which, however, can do nothing but investigate conditions. It has no authority to change hours of labor or order any other restrictions. It cannot even recommend legislation, because Congress, under the constitution, lacks authority to pass such laws. The best that can be hoped for is the creating of public sentiment through the publication of the results of its inquiries. There was evidence before Congress that boys and girls as young as six and seven years were put into the mills and compelled to work ten and eleven hours a day. The result of such a state of affairs in degrading and debasing humanity, need not be described in detail here.

We are glad to say that the Thanhouser picture will accomplish the same results that are expected from the work of the Federal Bureau, to wit: the arousing of public indignation. The pictures are admirably conceived, do not at any time go beyond the line of probability and bring home their lesson in a forceful, but perfectly natural and convincing way. No dramatic derrick has been used to drag in a counterfeit love story. The makers of the film have kept before their eyes the one idea: the enlightening of the public as to the conditions and effects of child labor. While the picture skilfully paints the extremes of our modern social life, it has steered clear of the fatal error of the old time melodrama in which, instead of human beings, the spectator was compelled to see a set of angels and a set of devils. "The Cry of the Children" as rendered by the Thanhouser Company, makes it plain that the mill-owner is as much a creature of circumstances and surroundings and economic conditions as the laborer. The picture shows the common bond of humanity between them and how the touch that makes all the world akin does not lose its magic in the wretched tenement of the laborer or in the mansion of the mill-owner or in the whirr of the factory.

A laborer and his family consisting of a wife and some half-grown children try to live in peace with the world and with themselves in spite of the awful conditions which surround them. They cannot, however, fight off the inevitable. The awful strain begins to tell on the mother who bears the heaviest burden. When she breaks down the youngest child in the family who had been kept at home and treated as the favorite was compelled to go to work. She could not stand up to her cruel task and live. Nature had not made her little limbs for bearing the burdens of hard toil and the little girl dies a victim of overwork. The mill-owner's wife had offered to adopt the little child, but her offer had been rejected by the child herself. Later when the child began to realize the odds against the laborer in the struggle of life she went to the mill-owner's wife and asked to be adopted, thinking in that way to lighten the burdens of her parents and sisters. But the grime of toil had replaced the child-like grace and sacrifice of former days. The bitter hours in the factory had changed the happy laughing child into a haggard looking waif. In her altered appearance she found no longer favor in the eyes of her employer's wife and necessity drove her back into the house of torture. The end of the picture shows the grief of the parents and sisters of the dead child and the bitter and cutting remorse of the mill-owner and his wife. As we look at the latter we feel the awful weight of the poem's words:

> "But the child's sob in the silence curses deeper > Than the strong man in his wrath."

Wherever these pictures are shown, converts to the necessity of thorough child labor reforms will be made by thousands. Owing to the determined opposition of Southern members of Congress the Federal Bureau entrusted with the investigation of child labor has had its powers narrowed and limited in many ways. In order to hamper the work of the bureau as much as possible an amendment was tacked on to the law, which prohibits an investigator from entering the laborer's home, if the householder objects. This amendment was not dictated by any tender regard for the privacy of the home, but is to be a weapon in the hands of the mill-owner, who by threats and intimidation will seek to influence his employee against the investigators. Right here the power of the motion picture asserts itself. They may be able to bar the investigator, but they cannot bar the man with the camera. The camera must create the demand for remedial legislation and second the labors of the Federal Bureau.

The remedy, of course, lies entirely with the legislatures of the individual states. The report of the Federal Bureau will be read by hundreds at best, while the pictures will be seen by millions. It seems to us that in the near future this fact will be recognized by the people most concerned in the matter, we mean organized labor. It was the labor element, which forced the establishment of the Bureau from an unwilling Congress. The labor element ought to realize the advantages of the motion picture as a means of agitation and be swift in making use of them. The protection of the minors working in store and factory is one of the live issues of the coming campaign for the election of a president. The pictures here mentioned are therefore very timely and ought to be welcome to every intelligent and progressive exhibitor. We will confess ourselves much mistaken if "The Cry of the Children" in motion pictures will not serve as a valuable campaign argument long before the votes will be counted in November.

PASTOR CRITICIZES "RELIGIOUS" FILMS.

Mr. Ernest Boehringer, a progressive exhibitor, conducting a theater at Baton Rouge, La., sends the following letter from a local pastor to the Moving Picture World:

Mr. E. Boehringer, March 28, 1912.
Columbia Theater, Baton Rouge, La.

Dear Mr. Boehringer: As you are aware I am a great believer in the educational value of motion pictures, and I and the people of my congregation are among your most regular patrons. I know that you have always tried to give the public a clean place and good pictures. But there is one abuse which I call to your attention and ask that you use your influence to correct. I have seen hundreds of films and many of them have dealt with religion and the church. While some have been fair, the majority of those which have dealt with the Protestant side of religion have been manifestly unfair and often abusive. When they have exhibited any phase of evangelical Christianity, they have made both ministers and churches and their religious life to appear ridiculous. The tendency is to excite contempt for such churches and awaken in impressionable youth a disgust for what we believe to be true Christianity. This country is composed largely of Prostesants and they have shaped our history. All that is considered best in our heritage has come to us through Protestantism. What will be the effect upon our youth and our institutions if the people gain their ideas of Protestantism from these false pictures? And I unhesitatingly pronounce them false and untrue to facts. This letter has been occasioned by expressed indignation on the part of many of your patrons. If you can remedy this we would appreciate your efforts. In the meantime I shall, with others, undertake to create sentiment against the exhibition of them and shall overture our General Assembly and through them overture other Prostestant bodies to advise their people to refuse to patronize any motion picture show in which are exhibited films that are unfair to us and injurious to our youth. Thanking you for your many favors to me and your own fairness, I am, Sincerely yours, T. M. HUNTER.

WHAT CLASS OF PICTURES ARE CHIEFLY REVIEWED IN THE MAGAZINES?

It is interesting to note the numerous articles now appearing in all the magazines and monthlies of every description concerning the moving picture. A universal note of appreciation is everywhere sounded, and predictions of the great and probable future of the powers of the pictures are repeated. Much that is written has already appeared on these pages, and that at a time when the magazines were taking a very different course to that which now seems to delight them.

In reviewing the picture, the common drama is almost ignored. The illustrated classics are occasionally referred to, while the educational ones are almost entirely studied in detail. Pictures of American history seem to take first place. This may be chiefly from patriotic interest and the pleasure these pictures give. Scientific subjects come next, evidently for the purpose of showing the powers of the moving picture as a teacher and revealer of the more hidden and consequently unknown details. The one theme dominating them all is along the new lines of moving picture educational work. Under the head of "Science and Invention," the Literary Digest in a recent issue devotes several pages to "Moving Pictures in the Classroom," traversing the outlook for teaching of common subjects in schools, it proceeds to describe (with illustrations) the teaching of Natural History, in the Versailles Lyceum, closing the article with an analysis of the cost of classroom cinematography, showing that because the larger initial expense is spread over a long period of usefulness the ultimate cost would not exceed five cents per lesson.

An elaborate article is also written on "Moving Pictures in Color." The details given show the writer is no novice. All these articles show the grip which the educational moving picture has secured upon the intelligent world, and they are increasing in every monthly issue. When one remembers the large number of people reached by all these magazines and papers, it can readily be realized what a great interest must shortly develop in that latest and best of all the benefits which have come from the moving pictures, i. e., their educational value.

Studio Saunterings.

By Louis Reeves Harrison

I FIRST met Carl Laemmle of the Imp Films Company when he was opening the office at 111 East 14th Street, which has since become the distributing bureau of The Sales Company, but at that time I had never seen this paper and knew nothing about the complications of various producers—all moving picture companies looked alike to me. I had sold a string of a dozen or fifteen plays in succession and had run up against the inevitable, a rejected scenario. It was hard enough to fail after entering the field with success so promising, and harder still to have the best photodrama I had written turned down again and again. I could not understand the situation and was very sore about it, when I happened to notice the sign at 111 and concluded to make one more trial before shelving a scenario that I believed would make a hit on presentation if it was given opportunity.

I was not much impressed by the emtpy store and few desks and chairs that I saw on entering the new office, but I found before I was through that there were plenty of live wires in the place, to whom I may make reference in other saunterings as they are all prominent in their respective fields to-day. Carl Laemmle had gathered about him some of the brightest people in the business and he proved to be personally alert to the advantages of a good starting point. He wanted the best plays procurable and was willing to take a chance with those appealing to men and women whose minds were not primitive.

MR. CARL LAEMMLE.
President of the Imp Motion Picture Co.

I saw at a glance that I had to deal with a man keenly alive to the money-making side of a proposition and hold enough to engage in financial transactions dependent for success upon unknown contingencies, yet entirely open to suggestion. I therefore depended on salesmanship to market my product. The result was satisfactory to all concerned. I sold my play; it fell into the hands of a director in whom I still repose the highest faith; the leading character was marvelously portrayed by Miss Lawrence; the settings were of rare beauty, and I had the pleasure of hearing a great audience give such approval as had never been accorded an Independent presentation. Shortly after, the critics applauded without exception, and my wounds were healed.

I have never forgotten little courtesies extended by Mr. Laemmle on that occasion. There is a very kind streak on the domestic side of his character as may be illustrated by a little incident which occurred while this particular photodrama was in process of production. There was a baby in it, and the infant had an important part to play. Mr. Laemmle had come on from Chicago, where he then lived, to witness the final picturing of the scenes, but baby was asleep at the switch when wanted. The owner of the company would not allow its slumbers to be rudely disturbed, so all hands waited two long hours while the tiny cherub finished its nap. The little creature then performed its essential role without a break. Good nature was good business, as it often is.

Since that early day I have often argued with directors against changes made in photoplays accepted, but no doubt exists that they are justified in altering a large proportion of the scenarios which fall into their hands. This is partially due to the small pains taken by aspiring playwrights with their scripts. The compensation may be very low in proportion to the effort required and not adjusted by producers to the relation of other costs, but the great mass of stuff sent in is so amateurish that it becomes evident that the writers are moved by vanity rather than serious ambition to succeed as playwrights on a large scale.

One of the most prominent agents engaged in searching for new plays for the stage, who is close to Belasco and Frohman and generally regarded as an expert in finding those who have the gift of writing hits, told me recently that the dramatists of the future will come largely from the ranks of those who succeeded in gripping and holding interest by screen representations. It will pay the photoplaywright to take pains as a matter of schooling before entering the larger field and not fret about the low price paid for one or two meritorious scenarios. One swallow does not make a summer, and any young dramatist possessing wealth of imagination can draw from that unfailing fount when the hour is ripe for the man.

A separation of the wheat from the chaff in photodramas will probably come when thousand-foot releases are supplanted by the big feature plays. The twenty-minute presentation on the screen will sooner or later be classed with the twenty-minute sketch on the boards. There is only room in it for swift character drawing and a miniature plot, whereas the full-grown photodrama will call out the finest efforts of those now being steadily trained in this form of composition. Photoplaywrights who are doing good work for small pay now need not worry about the future. Their time is coming.

On the other hand, however, a serious weakness in present production is the lack of men who know how to direct a play as a first conductor does an orchestra. Mr. Griffith, Mr. Blackton and others can take a script fresh from the composer's hands and see that their performers render it as it was written, only adding such harmonizing embellishments as are consistent and appropriate. Composition, direction and performance are three different arts which become merged in one presentation of an idea. It may or may not benefit a dramatist to have been a poet, an actor or a stage manager, but this is an era of specialization. Whether a man is a playwright, a director, an actor, an electrician, a scene painter, salesman or manager of the business engaged in financing and using general good judgment, he is at his best when limited to fine work in his particular department.

I have seen well-written plays so badly mangled by directors, trying to give an inside impression that they were the whole thing, by unnecessary alterations, that the original idea was entirely lost, if indeed it had ever been grasped. A director who imagines that an ingenious situation, an opporthnity for an actress, or an original mechanical contrivance is enough to make a play succeed had better go back to where he started and begin over again. All things that contribute to the expression of any drama above farce-comedy are but accessories to the interpretation of an idea. What is most needed at this moment, when a change in the character of moving pictures is taking place, is a corps of directors who know how to direct.

Such, in brief, were the subjects of conversation during my recent visit to the Imp Film Company's offices. I had gone by especial appointment to talk it all over with Mr. Laemmle, but he was called away at the last moment. When I came in touch with Mr. Stern, however—he is in full charge of the studio—I obtained a much clearer idea of his character than I had before enjoyed and could see that his company was quietly making preparations to keep abreast of the times. Mr. Sterns is a man of great endurance, persistence, and efficiency. He is positive in his opinions, but a logical reasoner, and open to conviction whenever a man opposed to him in views can command his interest and respect. In our conversation about photoplay directors he put it to me, as many others have, that he was facing a condition not a theory. A great many studio directors claim that they cannot do justice to a play nor to themselves unless it appeals to them.

I have written plays, staged them and even painted the scenery, but I will leave that all out of the question for it does not mean anything at all. The fact that a man can write a magazine story does not mean that it is going to interest those who read it, and the fact that a man can direct the action of a photoplay does not mean that it will be entertaining to the audience or of value to the producer. If. Mr. Brewster, editor of the Motion Picture Story Magazine, gives me an assignment and the scenario is poorly constructed, or if there are only a half dozen lines of it, I attend to my business, convert the script into story form to the best of my ability and in accordance with his ideas instead of putting up a childish whine that it does not "appeal to me." Oh Piffle!

Tell that to any newspaper man! Reporters are sent out on all kinds of assignments, dangerous and disagreeable, and prove their manliness, ability and courage by doing splendidly with the poorest sort of material.. You can count upon it, Mr. Stern, that directors of that grade will never make a success whether the play appeals to them or not. It is not in them. They may have learned the logic and principles of the art, but Nature neglected to give them the power of original thought and its adequate expression. A real man will quickly show ability instead of complaining, will regard the interests of those paying him as of paramount importance and will do his level best with the materials in hand. The one of exaggerated sensibilities is either a faker or a weakling.

What is to be done? Your problem is that of nearly every producer in the country. To remedy matters—the desire for better plays is universal—I should begin at the top. Most of the men engaged in this business are commercial by instinct and training. They are taking the brunt of a lot of hard work and are engaged in overcoming all sorts of difficulties for the purpose of making money. They give too little attention to the artistic side of photoplay production, very few of them read a line on a subject requiring constant study, they are not in close sympathy with those actively engaged in constructing these dramas of the eye, and they fail to kindle enthusiasm among their artisans by the right sort of environment. Studios should not have the oppressive gloom and general hideousness of factories, but a large majority of them are given over to excesses of commercialism.

KING BAGGOT,
Popular Leading Imp Player.

Independent producers are a game lot. They will stand a loss of a few thousands without a murmur, but how many of them have spent a few hundreds on an art library? Suitable reference books are not comprised in two or three on ancient costumes. It would make a great difference in the quality of background and performance if means were at hand for more complete study of this new art from the standpoint of older ones, especially in design and handicraft. It would mean a great deal to directors, actors, and to producers themselves if a few shelves of books throwing light on the pictural art were at hand.

House decoration is indicative of civilization. Domestic interiors afford the visible evidence of standard of living, yet how many shown on the screen are representative of American culture and refinement? A professor of the Ecole des Beaux Arts, Paris, told me that our modern houses were the most beautifully furnished of any in the world, many of them excelling the palaces of Europe, but no one would guess it from our moving picture settings. The ideas of home and comfort are as little reflected in photodramas as amid the constraints of city flats. The decorative designer must necessarily depend upon the litter of a "prop" room or that of the junk shop if no inspiration or suggestion is afforded such as could be found in a few volumes of Country Life or other periodicals devoted to the "home beautiful."

There are illustrated works on colonial houses and interiors which would help in the perpetuation of local history, and many others would be of assistance in setting forth our legends, poetry and romance. All this would help to grind the money-making mill, for people all over the country are deeply interested in the beauty and charm of home life—all of us detest the hideousness of stage artificiality and enjoy what is quaint, picturesque and pleasing, when it is real. Lady Beauty should be the honored guest of every studio instead of begging for admission only to be driven from the door.

I have no complaint to make of the actors—The Imp Film Company has a treasure in King Baggot—for they operate under great disadvantages and usually do the best they can with limited opportunity. It seems to me that the principal difficulties in the way of artistic production are created by those most largely rewarded. As to the question of good plays I believe Mr. Stern was very much in earnest when he said, "We want the very best and are willing to pay for them promptly and well." "How can we get them?"

The problem is not an easy one to solve, but I will make a few suggestions in a purely helpful spirit. Ask play wrights to state whether their compositions are original or adapted. If adapted, whether from classic or copyright sources. Request a preamble explaining the purpose of the photodrama, the idea to be conveyed, and what particular merit it possesses that makes it worth purchase and production. This will serve in the process of sifting out what is desirable from the unfit. Those rejected should be returned within a week and in good order. Prompt action and courtesy in the scenario department inspires confidence and leads to renewed effort. Those accepted should be paid for with equal promptness. This initial expenditure is trifling when compared to the general cost of production, and no reason exists why an author should wait for his wages more than an actor or a director. In sending back a script of high quality, which does not suit your requirements, add an explanatory line to the author and a request for other examples of his work.

All this will become imperative with the advent of the big feature play, and that is the trend of the business. Producers are venturing cautiously with from two-reel to five-reel adaptations from what is classic or merely stale, but subjects of live interest, both educational and entertaining, will make the hits of the season. The Paul Rainey pictures of animal life in the jungle are both interesting and instructive. They represent a step in the right direction, one taken by Mr. Laemmle with characteristic courage, and I cannot believe, from the glimpse I had of them, that they will not meet with decided success. I was profoundly impressed by the excerpts shown me in the exhibiting room.

Not only intelligent exhibitors but wideawake rental agencies throughout the country are after moving pictures which appeal to the thoughtful element in our mixed audiences, which draw patronage from the best classes; and this will result in commercial returns larger, steadier and more widely distributed than ever before in the history of the New Art.

BIG PRODUCTION FROM THE HOLY LAND.

Although all the facts are not at hand at this writing, the Moving Picture World is informed that the Kalem Company contemplates something unusual in the way of pictures from the Holy Land. Its company of players is at present in Jerusalem, but its director, Mr. Sidney Olcott, is on the way to London, where he will meet Mr. Frank J. Marion, president of the company, within the present week, to confer upon the extensive plans not hitherto arranged.

Mr. Marion left New York, Monday morning, April 15th, on the Cunard liner, Carmania, taking with him some extra players. Other players will be engaged in London. Just what is the nature of the work has not been explained by the Kalem Company, but it has been intimated that a number of large productions, requiring a great many people in the cast, will be made.

The Edison U. S. Historical Series No. 7 is entitled "Washington Crossing the Delaware." The famous painting now in the Metropolitan Museum of Art by Leutz is used as an authority for the production of this picture. It is a welcome and valuable addition to the educational list, produced with care and under circumstances intended to instruct.

Good Bye
Vancouver

MR. J. D. WILLIAMS AND PARTY.

Just before leaving Vancouver, B. C., for their return trip to Australia, the J. D. Williams party had their pictures taken, from which the above reproduction was made. Reading from right to left the members of the party shown here are: Louis Corbeille, general manager for the Baltimore System, Vancouver; L. W. Marshall, president of the same company; H. W. Cooper, American automobile promoter; J. D. Williams, Australian picture magnate; Charles Kilpatrick, "dare devil" bicycle rider; Alderman E. Lindsey Thompson, of Sydney; Leon Phillips and W. H. Bell, of the Williams Company. The ladies in the center are Mrs. Cooper and Mrs. Bell.

The Moving Picture Educator

"WILD BIRDS AT HOME" (C. G. P. C.).

NATURAL HISTORY films are enriched by this addition. When it is known that very short range views of such nervous birds as the wild duck, coot, swan, mallard duck, chaffinch and wren have been obtained, it will readily be acknowledged that a most patient and expert photographic artist has been at work. The results are most priseworthy, not only for excellence of portraiture but for thorough detail.

School children have never had such opportunities as these now presented to them, while experienced naturalists will rejoice when they see this film. It is worthy of note that not only is the student in school helped and interested but the student of natural history and the expert naturalist will find great value in the knowledge and information which these film studies impart.

While beautiful as simple pictures, a thoroughly explanatory set of subtitles is given and a previous knowledge of them will give interest to everyone to whom educational cinematography is important.

The beginning of the film shows that:

1.—The wild ducks live in peaceful communities among the reeds far from the haunts of men. In this retired place they seem as peaceful and homelike as the most domesticated, and are undisturbed by either animal or human intruders.

2.—The family has no care except to swim and eat. Truly nature is beautiful and, with silvery water and golden reeds, care is banished, with nothing to do but eat, live, and multiply. Their only change is when a trespasser ruthlessly enters their domain and they become—

3.—A startled party. The sudden and spontaneous rush of the whole flock in one direction at the same moment is quite a thriller. A pretty flight is well pictured, and the concerted habits of the flock is a lesson in duck wisdom.

4.—The coot returns to her duties after luncheon. This shows the nervous coot returning to her nest of eggs upon which she is sitting. So real is the picture that everyone feels they must be quiet lest she be disturbed. Someone moves, however, and away she flies, but—

5. The instinct of motherhood is stronger than fear. The coot, though frightened, returns to her nest and proceeds to give a practical lesson to everyone who has ever tried to run an incubator and experimented upon nature's secret of egg-turning, for the mother coot shows the science of nature as—

6.—She turns her eggs with her feet before settling down. A veritable picture of domestic comfort.

The Mallard Duck.

7.—In a peaceful spot, hidden by reeds, the mallard duck builds her nest. Under similar conditions to those of the wild duck this bird finds a sequestered nook wherein to raise her brood. An alarm drives her away, but she soon returns and, turning and regulating the eggs with her bill, settles down to the safe and sure process of nature's incubation. Soon she has—

8.—A family to be proud of. The downy ducklings make an awkward attempt to navigate on their feet. Awkward in their first attempts at walking, the youngsters will be called "cute" by everyone who sees this pretty domestic picture of wild little birds, little different from the domesticated ones. They show that—

9.—In the water, however, they are instantly at home as they begin to disport themselves in their native element, where—

10.—The ducklings are expert divers the first time they take to the water. True to their reputation, which gives origin to the expression, "as easy as a duck takes to water." Fear they have none. It is not all work either, for while there may be no rules to guide them, they appear to be—

11.—Playing hide-and-seek as they one after the other disappear underneath the water only to reappear several feet away and, when pursued by their playmates, disappear again and again. Thus we are favored with views of their lives and habits which could only otherwise be obtained under exceptionally favored circumstances. A domestic contrast is—

12.—The stately Wild Swan, which searches the bottom of the stream for food. At once dignified and majestic, the swan is admired by all.

The Wren.

13.—Cunningly hidden in the ivy on the old walls, the modest wren builds her domed nest. Again the photographer has come to close range with one of the most timid birds and with excellent results. The nature of the home in a well-protected place and the habits of the bird are now under our closest possible inspection.

14.—The male sedge warbler finds the food while the mother tends her young. The industrious provider and the attentive nurse-mother are almost human in their actions. There is certainly a remarkable degree of intelligence displayed by these mere mites of birds. Deep interest will always follow this picture.

The Chaffinch.

15.—The chaffinch feeds its hungry young in their nest in the hedgerows all day long. More of a wayside than a hiding bird, the always feeding parents are engaged in feeding their always hungry progeny. Even after leaving home—

16.—A fledgling which has left the nest is still tenderly cared for and fed by its parents. Any educational institution having cinematograph opportunities must have this series. It is a standard work in which beauty, pleasure and profit are combined.

EGYPT AS IT WAS IN THE TIME OF MOSES.

A NOTABLE addition to the list of educational pictures has been made by the Kalem Company, under the title, "Egypt as It Was in the Time of Moses." This subject consists of motion pictures of the methods of tilling the soil, making straw brick, and making cloth as pursued by the Arabs of the Upper Nile Valley. It may seem a misnomer to say in connection with this picture "as it was in the time of Moses." Yet it is true that the processes pictured are identical with those mentioned in the Bible. In fact, it may be said that the beginning of these quaint methods dates back thousands of years before the time of Moses.

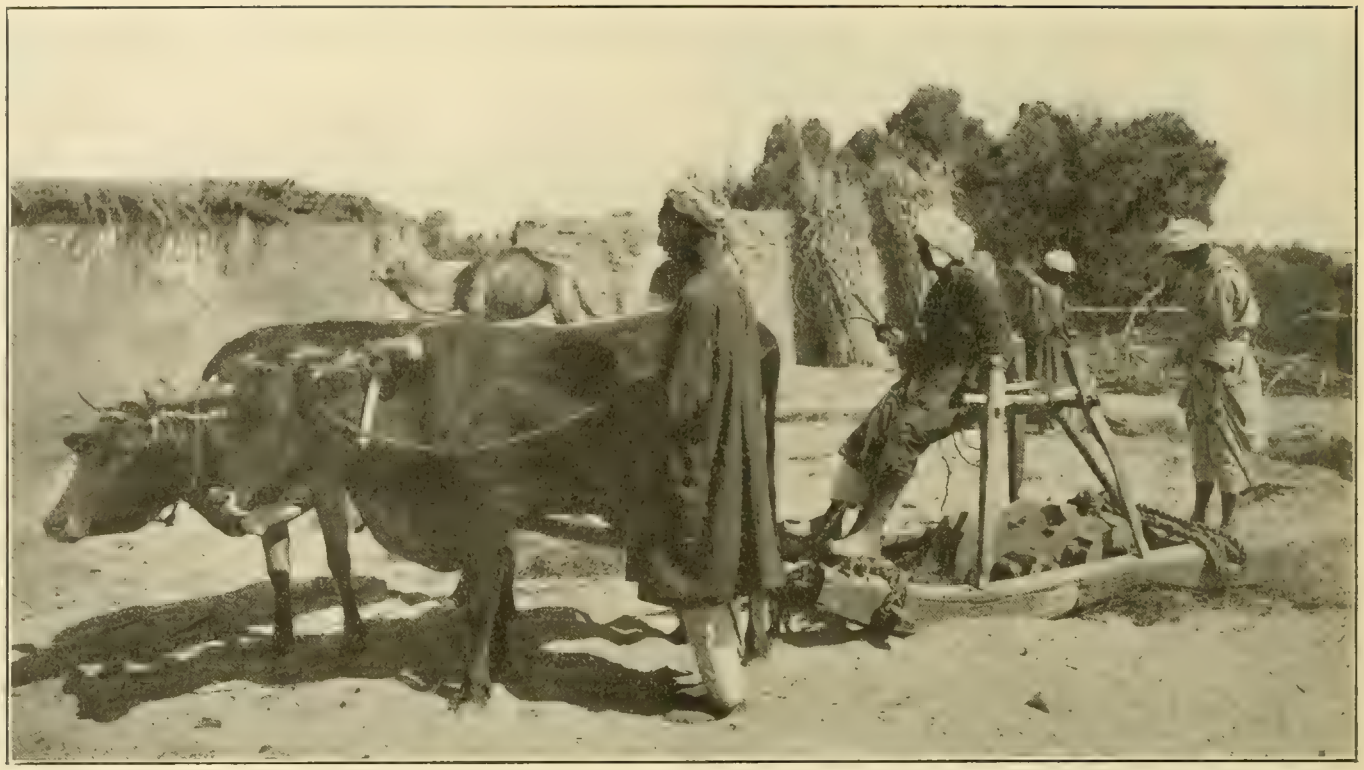
The pictures were made by the Kalem Company in Egypt and are most excellent from a photographic point of view, as well as for the light they shed upon the habits of the peculiar people of the region. The Kalem Company has, after careful research, prepared a lecture to go with this subject. With its permission the Moving Picture World is able to present the same to its readers herewith. This picture is of absorbing interest and will be found useful to students of Egyptology and Biblical history.

Suggestion for Lecture to be Given with "Egypt As It Was in the Time of Moses."

TILLING THE SOIL—PLOUGHING.—This interesting series of pictures made by the Kalem Company in Egypt gives you a clear idea of the manner in which the natives have labored for thousands of years. As the years roll on we find that the customs of the Egyptians have not changed since the time of Moses. Through a peculiar phenomenon the River Nile overflows its banks once each year, making agriculture possible in this dry and desert country, but in many places artificial means are employed to water the land. Hence you see in the background an old well, where the water is raised to the earth's level by camel power. In the foreground we see the laborers ploughing and it is apparent that irrigation will be required to make the hard dry soil fertile.

FORMING THE IRRIGATION SQUARES.—The Egyptians are engaged in the first process of irrigation. See the rude tools with which they work. The dry earth is worked into little patches and when the water is turned into the channels which you see being constructed, the workmen will be able to control the flow by manipulating the small dams.

THE "SHADOOF" WHICH RAISES WATER FOR IRRIGATION PURPOSES.—In the southern parts of Upper Egypt, when the River Nile is at its lowest, four or five of these "shadoofs" are required to bring the water to the level of the fields. At one end of the long sweep is a heavy weight, composed chiefly of mud, which lifts the bucket about eight feet into the air, where it is emptied into a trough. The buckets are made of basket-work and sometimes of leather or woolen stuff placed through a hoop. This method of raising water is of unknown antiquity, as the picture writings of the process have been found in the inscriptions on ancient tombs and in the sculpturings from Nineveh.



Threshing With a "Norag"—Scene from "Egypt As It Was in the Time of Moses" (Kalem).

SOFTENING THE GROUND PRIOR TO SOWING.—The water is now turned into the little patches, which we saw being made in an earlier scenc. The laborers divert the flow of the water by tearing out one small dam and building another. Agriculture in Egypt is classified in two divisions: that which is done in the land naturally watered from the Nile and that of the districts which are irrigated. The total area of cultivated land in Egypt is six million acres.

SOWING AND HARROWING.—Here we see the primitive custom of sowing seed by hand. Oftentimes sheep and goats are turned into the newly planted field to tramp down the seed. We can readily understand the significance of the parable which refers to the seed that falls on fertile soil, while some falls among stones or is blown away by the wind.

FERTILIZING A HALF-GROWN WHEAT FIELD WITH "GUANO." The wheat crop is now half grown and the industrious, Egyptian farmer is encouraging its development by scattering fertilizer, made from "guano." In the lands which are naturally watered the usual custom is to plant but one crop which consists of wheat, barley, lentils, beans, lupins, chick-peas, etc. The irrigated lands usually yield three crops annually, the first being given to wheat and barley, the second to millet, indigo and cotton and the third another crop of millet or maize. Sugar is cultivated throughout a large portion of Upper Egypt and rice in the lowlands near the Mediterranean.

REAPING.—The old sickle is the implement with which the grain is reaped in Egypt. What a contrast this ancient process presents when compared to our modern harvesters which reap and bind. Oftentimes the grain is cut off close to the tassel. Again we see how the camel is utilized and the loads which they are capable of carrying.

PRIMITIVE METHOD OF THRESHING WITH A "NORAG."—Now that the wheat has been harvested we see the Egyptian in the midst of his threshing. The wheat is placed on the ground and a rude cart known as a "norag" is driven over it. There are usually eleven small iron wheels or thin circular plates fixed to the axles. These discs in their revolutions not only force out the grain, but chop up the straw, which is used as fodder or worked into bricks, as we shall see in a later picture.

WINNOWING. THE STRAW CHAFF IS USED IN MAKING BRICKS.—The wind carries off the chaff as it is thrown into the air by means of wooden forks and the grain, falling to the ground, is gathered up and sifted. The Egyptians are not as wasteful as might appear in this picture, as very little of the grain escapes their attention and the chaff is carefully raked up.

GRINDING THE WHEAT INTO FLOUR.—Here we see an Egyptian flour mill. The grain is placed in the cylinder and a revolving stone crushes it into flour. While we do not envy the Egyptian's labors, we have no doubt that the result of these crude methods is a genuine whole wheat flour, with no adulteration.

KNEADING THE DOUGH.—This is baking day and the women are preparing the bread for the ovens. Apparently this process of kneading has changed but little in the past four thousand years, except that the modern housewives of our country much prefer to use a bread board. As usual, the natives do their work seated upon the ground.

A NATIVE OVEN.—The Egyptian scorns the use of cooking utensils, and we see the small loaves placed directly into the oven. "Itfaddalow!" ("have one!") The girl is quite proud of her handiwork and holds out a loaf for the tourist, offering the assurance that it is all right and worth trying.

MAKING STRAW BRICK.—As we pass along the shores of the River Nile we find natives engaged in the making of brick. Here we see the first step of the process, as the Egyptian digs up the clay with his rude implement. There still exist in Egypt perfect preservations of the sun-baked bricks made by the Egyptians and Babylonians over four thousand years ago On some of these bricks are valuable inscriptions relating to the cause of their making and information regarding the history of many different families.

MIXING IN THE STRAW.—We now see how the straw and chaff is utilized as the workman mixes it in with the clay. Among the specimens of brick found to-day, which were made during the time of Moses, there are many which bear silent testimony to the dark days in Egypt referred to in the book of Exodus. The children of Israel were ordered to furnish their own straw without diminishing the supply of brick. As the poor people had no way of securing the coveted chaff, their labors were fraught with many trials and "bricks without straw" has become a common adage.

MOULDING THE BRICKS, WHICH ARE DRIED BY THE SUN.—When one visits a brickyard in this country he sees the moulded clay placed in a kiln and baked by intense heat. In Egypt, however, the bricks are sun-dried and artifiicial heat is unnecessary.

MAKING CLOTH.—The first step in the making of a woolen garment is to shear the sheep and here we find the animal complaining that the workman's shears are none too sharp. His protest seems to go unheeded. Several authorities claim that weaving had its origin in Egypt, and in fact the Egyptians declare that their goddess, Isis, was the inventress. Old carvings have been found which depict the figure of the goddess holding a spindle in her hand. The Egyptians are noted for their manufacture of linen and it is said that the product of bygone centuries has never been equaled in modern times.

SPINNING THE YARN.—Here we see a primitive arrangement for spinning yarn. In the days of our ancestors a decided improvement was made on this method and there is not one of us who has not seen an old spinning wheel. The Egyptians are not inclined to be progressive and that which was good enough for their fathers seems to be good enough for them. It is a matter of interest that these primitive processes are almost identical with those employed by the Moki and Navajo Indians of our own Southwest.

FINISHED AND PAID FOR.—The garment is now ready for delivery and the old weaver receives his pay. You will notice how careful he is to ascertain that he has been given the proper amount and his assistant, in turn, assures himself that he has not been cheated.

NOTE.

"Me and Bill" (Selig) is a good picture with a strong sentiment, and when seen by the writer in one of New York's largest theaters was loudly applauded at the end. "Me and Bill" are two country schoolboys in Colonial times. They marry two sisters and have happy homes, one with a daughter and the other a son. Later in life their wives die; the children become lovers. The son responds to Lincoln's call and goes to the front. When he is listed with the "missing," the daughter dies by drowning, from excessive grief. Thus after a happy life, saddened with such tragic endings, "Me and Bill" are again alone—two aged men trying to comfort each other. The story is well told and holds the sympathy of the audience, which shows warm appreciation at the constant exhibitions of pure human affection.

Poe in Pictures

Eclair Company Produces a Two-Reel Subject Based on "The Raven."

CHALK up another credit for Eclair. In producing a subject like "The Raven," any picture company is entitled to commendation for doing its share in bringing the business into higher repute. The mention of "The Raven" as a moving picture subject suggests difficulties from the very start. Its production requires that a producer evolve his results from thin air. The problem is—given the poem of Edgar Allen Poe, with some historical facts; let them be presented before the world at large in the form of two interesting reels of motion pictures. This has been done by the Eclair people in the most praiseworthy manner.

The part of Edgar Allen Poe is played by Mr. Guy Oliver, who seems to have a comprehensive idea of the character and personality of Poe. The first reel has to do principally with events that led up to the writing of the celebrated poem, "The Raven." It is shown how Poe was struggling in poverty as a scrivener in the endeavor to provide sustenance for himself and invalid wife, "Lenore," who required medical attention that further increased their burdens. The great love of Poe and his wife for each other is illustrated, to show the source of inspiration whence sprang the immortal "Raven."

Scene from "The Raven" (Eclair).

The despair of Edgar Allen Poe, as he began the work upon "The Raven," is well depicted. He began it apparently without inspiration and merely intended no doubt to produce a "pot boiler", something he could turn into ready cash for the immediate needs of his wife. Approaching his task in dejection the muse would not commune with him. At last he fell asleep at his table and dreamed of the children of his brain that had started on before through the ages, but would never return to help him. There is a succession of visions following here illustrative of the successful stories from the pen of Poe. This double exposure work is handled in a manner that will carry the thread of the story along well, and from a technical point of view it is about as perfect as is possible to turn out. These successive scenes from the various stories bring back fond remembrances of his works to those who are familiar with them, and they will quite surely awaken an interest in Poe among those who have never read him. These visions include scenes from the "Gold Bug," "The Black Cat," "The Murders in the Rue Morgue," "The Descent into the Maelstrom," "Buried Alive," "The Pit and the Pendulum," etc.

The second part of the picture deals with the actual writing of "The Raven." Poe, sitting at his desk, is suddenly transformed, by a mental process, to lovely surroundings. He imagines himself to be in a home of affluence, where all his worldly desires are fulfilled, except for the presence of Lenore. In those delightful surroundings he hears the tapping of "The Raven," and presently the bird appears standing on the bust of Pallas. The hand of the author is shown from time to time, large upon the screen, and as the pen writes, the words of the poem are quite visible the instant they are made. After each phrase of the poem there is a flash back to the Raven and Poe, and so on until the poem is completed.

Scene from "The Raven" (Eclair).

When the poem is completed we see Poe leaving his home to go to the publisher's to get money for the work that has occupied him all night. He is shown leaving his homestead in the Fordham section of New York City. The real Poe homestead was used as the setting for the picture, just as it stands at the present time near Bronx Park, New York City. The poet is shown beginning the long walk to New York proper, and then his arrival at the publisher's office. He is offered there a niggardly $10 for his masterpiece. Had he been more independent he would have refused, but being pinched by poverty he was obliged to pawn it like one pawns a beautiful jewel. His return with flowers and provisions to Lenore makes an artistic ending to a picture that is well done throughout, and can be called a feature by virtue of its literary value.

"ENGLISH HUNTING SCENES."

On Saturday, May 18th, the Imp Films Company release a very beautiful subject which will be of unique interest to moving picture patrons. This film depicts some of the characteristic life of the hunting field in England. The old world villages, huntsmen, hounds; the pursuit and capture of the quarry which are shown in the film are full of incident and excitement. The peculiar English character of this sporting film should excite the interest of the enormous sporting section of the United States.

"JESS" FOLLOWS "CRY OF CHILDREN."

Bang! Bang! One after another! Thanhouser gives "Cry of Children" on Tuesday, April 30th, and now they push over an announcement of "Jess," by H. Rider Haggard, for Tuesday, May 28th. Three-sheets for "Cry of the Children" are going fast at the Independent exchanges, also the two varieties of one-sheets. Prices of booklets are supplied by Thanhouser Company on request.

CHICAGO LETTER.

By Jas. S. McQuade.

THEODORE E. CLEMMONS, son of the former president of the First National Bank of Longview, Tex., and president of the Imperial Theater Co., of Beaumont, Tex., in which enterprise his brothers Joseph, Thomas, Morris and Robert are also interested, has been the victim of a confidence man, who represented himself as manager of Essanay's Western Company, No. 2. The following letter, dated April 11, just received by V. R. Day, manager of Essanay's city office, explains how the bogus film manager gained his confidence, and "blew out" to parts unknown.

"Gentlemen:

"Several days ago I played Longview, Texas, with a tent show, having been away from Beaumont for about a month. There I met a man who represented himself as J. C. Raymond, manager of your Western company, No. 2, and that he expected to make a picture of the robbery of the First National Bank in 1894. As my father was president of the bank that was robbed, and as I look so much like my father and was familiar with the story, he offered me a contract to work for him in the production of the picture.

"I am enclosing you copies of the local newspapers and his contract with me and other papers, and a perfect description of this faker. From the looks of the enclosed drafts, he evidently has been passing bad drafts of the Rand McNally Company also.

"I went with him to Dallas, Texas, to meet the Essanay company and we got a room at the Waldorf Hotel. When I awoke the next morning my diamond stud and money were gone; likewise Mr. Raymond. I immediately notified the officers at Dallas and Fort Worth, and also offered a reward for his capture, and returned to Longview and paid the Guaranty State Bank $100 for a draft he cashed there. As I then knew, it was no good.

"Understand, I am not crying, but I must add that I was a real sucker. He also stung the Magnolia Hotel at Longview for his board and some money.

"I am writing you this thinking that it might be of some service to you and that you might assist in catching this man. Most of the papers I am enclosing you I obtained from his grip in his room in Longview, upon my return from Dallas. You are at liberty to keep a copy of the enclosures for your benefit, but please return me the originals, as I wish to turn them over to the local detectives and try to catch this man. I believe he went from Fort Worth to El Paso, as he seemed headed that way."

Following is a description of the swindler, with the aliases he has been passing under, as sent out by Chief of Detectives J. C. Alexander, of Dallas, Texas:

"Look out for and arrest the following described man: Charge, theft and swindling. Name, J. C. Raymond; white man; age about 30; height about 5 feet 6 inches; weight about 157 pounds; stout build; clean shaven; complexion medium; hair black. When last seen was wearing a dark blue striped three-piece suit, black derby hat, black button shoes, trade marked 'Selz,' size about 6½; one button off right shoe; shirt collar 15¼ or 15½. A black broken comb in coat pocket. He is a moving picture show man. Robbed Theo. E. Clemmons of one diamond and some money at Waldorf Hotel, Dallas, Texas, on April 3. Stud weighs about ⅝ karat, set in platinum. Cashed bogus draft, at Longview, for $100, drawn on Essanay Film Co., Chicago, Ill., at the Guaranty State Bank. Also goes under the name of Arthur Sherwood and Wayburn. Also represents himself as L. R. Rand of Rand, McNally Printing Co., Chicago. Main graft, confidence man. Cashes bad checks and drafts.

"Notify Chief of Detectives J. C. Alexander, at Dallas, Texas, or Cashier Finch, Guaranty State Bank, Longview, Texas, or Theo. E. Clemmons, at Beaumont, Texas. Reward for his arrest."

To show how thoroughly the swindler worked his game and "put it over" a keen business man of Mr. Clemmon's caliber can be gathered from the following extract from the Longview Press, of April 3:

"T. E. Clemmons, eldest son of the late T. E. Clemmons, who was president of the First National Bank during the famous Dalton robbery here in 1894, has been engaged by the Essanay Film Company through their representative, Mr. J. C. Raymond, to act the part of his father in their motion picture to be entitled the 'Longview Bank Robbery,' and he will receive $1,000 for the act. Mr. Clemmons is an exact duplicate of his father, and his appearance in the picture will make it more realistic. Mr. Clemmons is assisting Mr. Raymond in making this picture true as life. He left Longview a few years after the robbery and for several years has lived in Beaumont, where he has been very successful in the theatrical business, and is now president of the Imperial Theater Company, owning several picture theaters in and near Beaumont. Theo. E. Clemmons is a self-made man and deserves much credit for his success.

"It is estimated that it will cost something like $18,000 to reproduce this picture. The film company will spare no expense in making this picture. The special train of this company left Kansas City last night and will arrive here to-night."

This fellow Raymond carried a printed card made out as follows:

No. ...., 191....

Mr. ....

Yourself and lady are cordially invited to attend a M. P. show at Private Car of Essanay Work.

Please fill convenient date and return.

....

J. C. Raymond's signature was written in the last blank line.

It is hoped that this man of many aliases will be caught soon, and swift justice meted out to him. He is very liable to try the same trick over again and will, therefore, confine his operations to people engaged in the moving picture business—exhibition or otherwise. Readers of the World should look out for him and assist in getting him in the grasp of the law.

Selig's "Maine" Picture Great Success.

Selig's great picture showing the burial of the Maine has evoked praise from all quarters of the country. The city office of the company has been flooded with commendatory letters from exhibitors, telling of big successes on short notice. Newspapers also have taken up the subject and add praise for the enterprise shown in filming the stirring scenes attending the last rites of the old battleship.

"W. R. R.," in his special column in the Denver Post, writes of this film as follows:

"He was a youthful member of the household, and he remarked at dinner: 'You ought to go to the Isis on Curtis Street to-morrow and see the pictures of the burial of the Maine and the attending scenes around Havana. It's great!' Takes a young fellow, you know, to find out a good thing. But I observed somewhat cockily, as though it displayed personal importance: 'I never go to picture shows.' However, I did go, acting on the boy's suggestion, and am very glad I did. The picture was on only Thursday and Friday—just why I cannot say. Those who saw it I think were exceedingly fortunate. I have seldom been more impressed. In fact, it made the lump of emotion come up in one's throat as the final scene pictures the historic ship tumbling and trembling in the waters, and then with the flag flying make the closing dive into her watery grave, 600 fathoms deep. The orchestra played the national air as the old barnacle-studded war vessel disappeared forever, the intense realism making many in the audience patriotically rise, and show tear-stained cheeks over the tremendous picture. Personally the writer wouldn't have missed that particular film for many dollars. It vastly increased his respect for the moving picture entertainment."

Austrian Minister of Education Praises "Coming of Columbus."

E. H. Montagu, European agent for the Selig Polyscope Co., who recently sold the Austrian rights for the "Coming of Columbus," writes that the Austrian agents had just communicated with him as follows, concerning that great Selig subject:

"The show itself was a great success and the general opinion of all showmen who saw the picture was that they had never seen such a film before and that it would be some time before we see another as good.

"In the evening we gave a special show and, among other high persons present, the Minister of Education for Austria expressed his opinion that the picture is wonderfully scened, or staged, and that it was really a pleasure to see such things.

"This was a great hit for the film, seeing that this is the head man over the School Censor here and, besides, that will recommend all schools to attend the theaters where it is being shown."

The Proposed Chicago Hippodrome.

Some time ago several of the Chicago dailies printed articles which stated that the old panorama building, on Wabash near Peck Court, had been leased, or purchased, for the erection of the largest hippodrome in America. Several St. Louis men were named as the principal promoters of the enterprise. These names have been investigated with the result that, with the excption of a Mr. Forrester, engaged in the brokerage business there, none claim connection with the Chicago project.

It now appears that the site mentioned in the Chicago papers was not the real one, and that it is located on North State Street, between Randolph and Lake. In fact, it is said that the property, which has been leased for 198 years by the promoters of the hippodrome, is the one-half block running from the alley north to Lake, on the west side of State, which was recently purchased by Mrs. Marshall Field, Jr.

This is a fine location, and the site affords ample space for the proposed building, which, it has been announced, will seat 5,000 people when completed.

Mr. Forrester, of St. Louis, has stated that most of the stock for this new hippodrome has already been subscribed by Chicagoans and that there are no shares for sale at present, but that 6 per cent. bonds can be had.

There has been so much mystery about the whole matter that it would cause no surprise if the thing turned out to be a canard. It has been rumored that the new hippodrome will offer six or seven acts of vaudeville, a big circus act and several reels of pictures, all for 10 cents, or a 75-cent show for a dime.

Chicago Film Brevities.

On and after Monday, May 6, the Chicago Exhibitors' League will meet on the 12th floor of the Schiller Building instead of at Harmony Hall, on Adams Street, as in the past.

Mme. Pilar-Morin, who is well known in film circles as a motion picture actress, will give four performances in silent drama at the Pabst Theater, Milwaukee, during the week of Monday, April 22nd. The lady paid Chicago a visit on Thursday, April 11.

Miss Martha Russell, formerly leading lady of one of Essanay's Eastern companies, who has just concluded a most successful lecture tour on moving pictures, has been reengaged for a short season with one of the Essanay Eastern companies, beginning Monday, April 15.

The Lyric, on the Jones, Linick & Schaefer circuit of houses, located at Van Buren and South State streets, is now running a picture program day and night without cessation. So far as known, this is the first theater in America that has ever adopted the practice.

The United Amusement Co. of Chicago, opened their handsome new theater, the Clarendon, on Wednesday, March 6, and the house has been showing to fine business ever since. The Clarendon, which is located at 3819 Clarendon Ave., is built of concrete and brick at a cost of $15,000. It seats 300 people. A fine ventilating system has been installed and the interior decorations and appointments are tasteful and comfortable. The indirect lighting system is used, and every modern aid has been provided to insure a well-projected picture. Four reels of Independent film are used daily, and only high-class musical attractions are employed to supplement the pictures. The admission is 10 cents. The service is furnished by the H. & H. Exchange. W. H. Sherwood, president of the United Amusement Co., is manager of the theater, and Richard H. Goldman is treasurer.

"The Serpents."

An Audacious Vitagraph Departure from the Beaten Path of Photodrama.

THE Vitagraph Company likes to play with fire. During the past few months they have done some things that have made folks sit up and rub their eyes. Sometimes their audacity in violating conventions has brought down censure upon their heads. At other times it has got by successfully and scored a big hit. There is an invisible dividing line somewhere between what people will stand for and that which they will not receive. The Vitagraph people like to hover near that line. Once in a while they get on the wrong side of it and then they get a good spanking from the public and the press.

There is one trait about the Vitagraph which anyone must admire—when they fall down they do not stay down; they get up and brush their clothes and go ahead again. It is easy to see, through the furore that some of the Vitagraph productions have caused, what they are driving at. They are aiming to get out of the rut. They are seeking a way out of the wilderness of commonplace moving picture drama. This, of course, is commendable, and, therefore, if occasionally they run foul of the public censor, they are to be forgiven for the effort they are making in trying to climb higher; out of the rut.

All this does not mean that "The Serpents" is going to raise any howl. But it might. It hovers around that imaginary line spoken of earlier in this discourse. In other words, it is daring, and if it accomplishes nothing else it will surely make the jaded theater-goer sit up, etc.; especially the bald-headed gentleman of the first row who used to figure largely in the pages of alleged comic weeklies.

Scene from "The Serpents" (Vitagraph).

Like many of the Vitagraph eye-openers it is done in a gloriously perfect way. The details have been so well attended to that nothing foreign appears to jar the artistic sense. "The Serpents" represents an episode in the life of primeval man and woman. Perhaps the idea of the story is to convey the truth of the fact that human nature has not changed one iota since the world began. In the dark ages laws were broad and simple. Self-preservation was the first law of mankind, then as now. In the matter of domestic connubiality, "to have and to hold" was also a law, and thereby hangs this tale.

There are six characters in the story and each one strong. The story opens with the return of Eric to his rocky abode, where he is greeted by his adoring mate, Chloe; Ralph Ince appearing as Eric and Miss Edith Storey as Chloe. They are cave dwellers dressed in skins and their livelihood depends upon the flocks that Eric herds during the day. Eric had a burly friend Haakon, the part being played by Mr. Tafft Johnson. Eric foolishly brought his friend home to supper one night, which is a thing that has often been done with disastrous results ever since; but those are other stories.

Haakon, being of a parasitical nature, began to make a mental appraisal of everything in sight, and particularly of Eric's wife—if she was his wife. Let us give her the benefit of the doubt. Haakon was wealthy, by the standards of the time; that is to say, he possessed many valuable skins which were an important article of commerce, and the chief token of trade. It appears that women in those days were equally as fond of adornment as they are to-day. A fine piece of fur appealed with equal force to Chloe then, as it would if she were living now. But she was not to be blinded by any such things as these, because her love centered on Eric, and in him alone she found happiness.

Nearby in a cave there dwelt a pagan priest. With him there was a fearful idiot. Mr. William V. Raynous played this idiot in a manner that will be long remembered by those who see it as a wonderfully realistic bit of character work. The priest, like most pagan priests of the time, was a sorcerer and a hypocrite. Aside from his holy duties he carried on a nefarious traffic in poisons and other accessories to violent death. There came to this cave one day a beautiful young woman clad in skins. Her name was Linda. This part was daringly played by Miss Helen Gardner, and goodness knows she "done fine," although some may not think so. The hideous mouthings of the idiot at her appearance did not seem to annoy her, for in general she was carefree and afraid of nothing. Linda was looking for her sister Chloe, and the idiot showed her the way to Eric's abode. Linda and Chloe had not seen each other for some time and were happy to meet again. Haakon was there at the time and all four sat down to eat.

Linda all her life had been a wild creature. Knowing no restraint of custom or feminine ethics, she immediately fell in love with Eric. The fact that Chloe was his acknowledged spouse made no difference with her. Her admiration was unconcealed, and apparently innocent, and when Eric did not receive her loving overtures, she was hurt like a wounded child. The next morning Eric started away to attend his flocks. Haakon, remaining behind, began his treacherous overtures to Chloe by dangling before her eyes the precious skins which he possessed. Meanwhile, Linda, with no other thought in mind than Eric, set forth at once to find him in the field, that she might beguile him to drop everything and dally with her. Nothing transpired that escaped the notice of Fangen, the idiot. He followed Linda to the field and then hurried back to observe Haakon making love to Chloe. Matters being propitious to his schemes, the idiot dragged Chloe to the field, where they arrived just in time to see Eric being embraced by Linda, entirely against his will. Eric explained to Chloe and the matter ended there with assurances of affection on both sides.

Haakon, finding that fair means were unavailable, resorted to the pagan priest, who dealt in foul means. He required a poison that would bring the sleep of death to Eric. This was obtained by trading one of his costly hides. Linda appeared soon after, requiring also a poison to make Chloe sleep. She had no expensive robe to pay with, but she paid for it just the same. Linda retired into the cave with the pagan priest, while the idiot watched with insanely jealous eyes. When they emerged he rolled a great big stone from above that fell and killed the priest. The idiot hastened then to the abode of Eric, where he found the deadly potions had been placed in the cups of Eric and Chloe. Just as they were about to drink the idiot interrupted by telling Haakon and Linda that the priest wanted to see them, as he had made a slight mistake. When they had withdrawn he exposed their treachery and exchanged the cups so that Haakon and Linda would drink their own poison. They returned in a moment and abused the idiot for his false alarm. Then Haakon drank from the poisoned cup and died. Linda would have drunk her poison, too, but the idiot dashed it to the ground, seized her and bore her away to the dead priest's cave, as his prize.

For audacity this picture has not been approached for some time. It remains to be seen how well it will take with the public. Our personal opinion is that it will get by and create a sensation on its merits. It is a big feature and can be billed strongly for several days at any house. It has been passed by the National Board of Censorship, which will help some. We sincerely hope that Miss Gardner did not contract a cold while the picture was being taken. H .F. H.

"THE CONQUEST OF MEXICO."

The Essanay Company announces that a magnificent production of "The Conquest of Mexico," in three reels, is now in preparation. Over two hundred people will be employed in the portrayal of the gigantic production. The entire history of the Mexican conquest will be covered in the three reels, from the first landing of Cortez and his followers on the coast, the trading and bartering with the awed and superstitious natives, the sinking of his ships by Cortez to prevent his men from deserting him, the march into the interior, first meeting with Montezuma, and the final conquest of the empire after years of struggle and strife. The Essanay Company intends making this great production one of the most gorgeous and stupenduous photoplay achievements ever attempted, and the subject assuredly warrants possibilities that will go down in film history.

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League OF AMERICA

NEW ENGLAND EXHIBITORS CONVENE.

Special Meeting of the Members of the Amusement Association of New England.

A special meeting of the amusement association of New England was duly called and held at Hotel Dreyfus, Boston, Mass., on Tuesday afternoon, April 9th, at 4.30 o'clock, for the purpose of electing a treasurer, a secretary and clerk, and for such other proper business as should come before the meeting. The meeting was duly called to order by the President, Frank J. Howard. More than a majority of the members were present. A ballot was taken and resulted in the choice of Jacob Lourie for treasurer and Ernest H. Horstmann for clerk and secretary.

The following nominations for the Board of Directors were made: Charles W. Hodgdon, Napoleon L. Demara, J. J. Cahill, Alden F. Washburn, E. J. Farrell, Glover Ware, Walter B. Sproule, Arthur E. Lord, Arthur G. Pearson, Felix Alland, Ernest H. Horstmann, Jacob Lourie, George D. Leonard.

The secretary was instructed to have a written ballot made and mailed to each of the members for their consideration and to vote with at the next meeting, to be called in the discretion of the president. The meeting then adjourned.

Immediately after the adjournment the forty odd people present filed into the private dining room and seated themselves before planked steaks and other things, good to eat and drink. Speechmaking was in order after the dinner and at the request of Mr. Frank J. Howard, president of the association, several speakers were heard.

Mr. Swett, of the Powers Company, was the first speaker, and gave those present an insight into the happenings and results of the recent Dayton, O., convention. Mr. Clark, of the Motiograph, and Bernard M. Corbett, of the Edison sales department, also spoke. These gentlemen dwelt strongly on the fact that the Middle Western exhibitors were strongly bound together for their mutual benefit and urged New England to get into line. The strongest speaker was Mr. Joseph Mack, of the Hub Theater, Boston. The gist of Mr. Mack's talk may be summed up in two points: (1) "We in New England talk too much and do little and (2) we must get together and be able to present fitting representation at the National Convention of Exhibitors to be held this summer."

Mr. Mack had the entire attention of his hearers, who responded with enthusiasm. As he stated, the whole movement has been furthered by a few men, chief of whom is Frank J. Howard, while the great majority of New England exhibitors seem to be only passively interested in their association. Mr. Mack's plea for more "get together," more co-operation, among New England exhibitors is entirely justified and judging from the expressions of various exhibitors will be productive of good results. Both the General Film Company and the W. E. Greene Film Exchange were ably represented, and, when called upon, merely reiterated Mr. Mack's sentiments. Mr. Ernest Horstmann also spoke with good effect. Another meeting is to be called soon, and things are being whipped into shape to give New England a real, well-knit body of exhibitors, banded together for their mutual advancement and betterment.

MONTGOMERY'S DAYTON HOUSE.

By the courtesy of Mr. F. T. Montgomery, the Moving Picture World presents two views of the new Montgomery Theater at Dayton, Ohio. The treatment inside and out is Egyptian. The beauty of the house is in the expensive decorations, rich plush, expensive carpets, white marble floors and ornate box seats. All the latest devices have been installed. The illumination is by the indirect lighting system. A Simpson Solar Screen has been installed. A continuous show is given from 1 P. M. until 11 P. M. A vacuum ventilating plant changes the atmosphere at different intervals, the system including two 60-inch exhaust fans. There is a fountain in the foyer with individual drinking cups and ice water, and ample reception and retiring rooms for the convenience of patrons. The music is furnished by an orchestra of six solo musicians, under the leadership of Mr. Buell B. Reisinger. Mr. Reisinger has been in Mr. Montgomery's employ for four years and is considered one of the best moving picture orchestra leaders in America. A glance at the engravings will give an idea of the decorative scheme. This house has been highly commented upon by Dayton newspapers.

"The Mystical Maid of Jamasha Pass."

(American).

Reviewed by Jas. S. McQuade.

THE American Western company has utilized the magnificent scenery of Southern California to fine advantage in selecting settings for the filming of the strange story of "The Mystical Maid of Jamasha Pass."

Doubtless founded on an Indian legend connected with the Jamasha Pass, this story in pictures has a decidedly uncanny effect on the beholder, as the atmosphere of mysticism has been well retained through all the incidents. The producer has availed himself of the light and shade effects of mountain scenery to depict day and evening and night scenes with excellent variation, and the camera man has been alive on his job all the time.

There are just four people in the cast—an old miner and two young ones and the maid who disappears through solid rock, or over yawning precipices. This maid, though of Caucasian blood, represents the Indian type of siren who lured men to ruin by her wiles, delighting in nothing so much as in the death throes of her victims. There is nothing, of course, in the film that is fearful to look upon; it is rather what the imagination is stimulated to conjure up that thrills and mystifies one.

It is about time for the evening meal when we catch sight of an old miner preparing for it in the gathering gloom of the Pass. Up on the mountain side, we see a young man cautiously descending. He joins the old miner and is welcomed to share the simple repast. Another scene shows us a second young miner, also seeking the pass over boulders and streams. He comes upon the others unexpectedly and is invited to join them.

During the meal the elder man tells the story of the beautiful girl whom he and others have seen high up on mountain ledges, just as evening passes into the night. While he talks, we see Jack, one of the young men, gaze steadily at something on the heights behind him. The scene changes for a moment and a young girl of bewitching face and charms is seen on the mountain, beckoning him to her side. Jack says not a word to his companions of the vision and continues eating. Soon Tom, the other young miner, turns his head and is thrown in spell by the same sight. Jack eyes him and both feel the pangs of jealousy.

When the meal is finished, the old miner packs up his effects and bids them good-night, for he has already told them that it means death to sleep in the Pass. When he departs the young men lie down for the night.

Again the scene changes to the gloom of the mountain slope, and the siren is seen hurling a stone in the direction of the sleepers. Jack is awakened by the sound, but Tom sleeps on. The former immediately starts in chase of the beautiful stranger, and we see him approaching her after a hard climb. Enamored, he tried to embrace this mountain elf, but falls back in astonishment and despair when he finds that she has vanished over the rocks. Then he rushes away to find her.

Tom is still sleeping when he is mysteriously awakened, just as the mystical maid is seen approaching through a rift in the rocks. He jumps to his feet and worships her with his eyes, as he goes to meet her. When completely under her mesmeric power, he tries to grasp her, but she mysteriously disappears.

Jack joins him at this time and both decide to leave the Pass. Wading streams and climbing over ledges, they move onward without a word. Then they come to a point where each decides to part from the other and go his own way.

Left alone, Tom immediately starts forth to find the mountain nymph, who has stolen his heart. Looking up, to a commanding height near him, he once more sees the object of his thought inviting him to her side. On the way to reach her, Jack is encountered, and both men part in anger, now knowing that each has tried to outwit the other.

Tom finally reaches the spot where he had seen her, and there finds her smiling at him entrancingly. Jack re-appears at this juncture, and a terrific hand-to-hand encounter takes place between the men, which results in Jack's being hurled into the chasm.

The maid glides away with an evil smile at the result, and is madly pursued by Tom. Spent and hurt to death in the chasm by falls and bruises, he finally spies her on the face of a great rock. Her smiles still allure him. With his last breath he seeks to embrace her, but finds nothing but the solid rock. Then he falls down and dies.

This film will be released Thursday, May 9.

CRITICAL REVIEW OF THE NEW YORK MOTION PICTURE COMPANY'S SERIES OF TWO-REEL WESTERN SUBJECTS.

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

THE New York Motion Picture Company is certainly engaged in blazing the trail of artistic achievement so far as depicting battle scenes is concerned, as I have never seen action more vivid and realistic than was shown in advance releases privately exhibited a week ago. Many of the foreground struggles between the primitive red man and the all-conquering white race would furnish themes for intense figure compositions, and the larger ensembles are marvelously clear. Vastness in them does not involve vagueness, but comprehensiveness of exterior detail.

The elimination of the wandering tribes hunting over this continent and so continually fighting among themselves that evolution had become improbable and decadence set in has been the subject of many written stories and almost as many pictured ones, not so much from interest in the dissolving races themselves as from the tragic action characterizing the continuous warfare for supremacy between representatives of progress and those of degeneration or arrested development.

The pictures are introduced by the moving portrait of a buffalo admirably centered, who gives the impression, in a grave sort of way, that he is something of a wag, but the story of his kind has been that of the Indian by whom he was being annihilated long before the white man came. This food animal of the continent formerly existed as far east as the Atlantic and as far north as Newfoundland. These animals were nearly extinct east of the Mississippi, and they were in process of extermination in their native wilds when the white flood began to sweep over the country.

There were probably less than a million Indians scattered over that part of the continent now known as the United States, subject to the ravages of relentless killing and torture—cruel, crafty and predatory—with no universal language, no marks of gradual enlightenment and incapable of contributing anything of value to human evolution when European races began to fight their way from ocean to ocean under all sorts of difficulties, including methods of warfare disastrous to the invaders. The natives were so well protected by natural advantages and their methods of fighting that it was a difficult matter to kill a redskin, whereas the whites were constantly exposed by their peaceful occupations to indiscriminate slaughter.

There is no discovery of rights and wrongs involved in the Bison productions. Conditions alone are presented, especially those which existed after the government attempted to regulate and control the various tribes, according them privileges still unenjoyed by white citizens, and punishing with severity acts of outrageous cruelty by the natives, and less severely acts of oppression by responsible whites. Race hatred was unavoidable and it is only modified to-day. The average descendant of colonial families has little use for the red man, regards him with distrust and, with a few poetic exceptions, considers him hopelessly beyond the pale of social contact.

The Indian, however, remains one of the most interesting and picturesque elements in our national history. He is almost typical of the fighting male, a restless, dominating, ever-struggling human creature, principally engaged in works of destruction, but representative of the ancestral strain that conquered all the other creatures delivered from the fertile womb of Mother Earth. He was essentially a man of physical action, using only that part of his brain which enabled him to be crafty in the hunt for food, though he had vague poetic ideals and nebulous dreams of barbaric splendor. Mentally he was far below the Egyptian of 6,000 years ago, but he was the physical superior of any man on earth except the strong-armed European who cultivated brain along with brawn.

The United States Government first tried to lead the tribes into civilized pursuits, but Mr. Redman was not strong of arm nor strong of purpose. He took to drink on small provocation and had a drunkard's lack of ambition, was satisfied with enough to keep him going and oppressed by an ingrowing distaste for work of any kind. Many Americans of high intelligence exhibited a genuine friendship for the Indians; the establishment of schools and colleges for them shows that. On the other hand, a lot of heartless scoundrels like those now preying on white people robbed the redmen by much the same methods, and constant "uprisings" ensued as a consequence.

These uprisings became a habit with the tribes, as they are also with the New York motion picture company directors. If the plain truth be told, we know in advance that the Indians are going to have a war dance and attack the settlers, that some hero or heroine will go through all sorts of perils to reach the military post, and that the troops will arrive in the nick of time. This pounding on the tom-tom of one idea indicates that the plays are made on the spot, and the sameness is only relieved by one strong outreach for sympathy. That occurs in "The Crisis"—it might better have been called "The Weakling."

In "The Crisis" there is a bid for interest in the central figure, a parson's son, that is effective. We are all mortal and most of us realize that there is an element of good in the victim of bad habits. We like to see him redeem himself. That is more manly than simply being good when there was no chance to be otherwise. In consequence, the weakling, the parson's son, reaches out beyond the screen and strums human sympathy. The types are good in this play so far as the men are concerned.

One woman sweeps on the screen like a whirlwind. She is Anna Little, a corking rider, full of vim in action, and one of the best actresses in her role I have ever seen. She is a find and only needs wider opportunity in plays of clearer character conceptions. It is a pleasure to see a heroine who can do something more than smile, roll her eyes, and embrace. The American girl is best typified by those of energy, never by the chalk-faces who stand at street corners on the Rialto.

If I may be accorded opportunity for a little suggestive criticism, and no man of ability resents this, I think there is the right material in this company for some spirited historical plays of high value. The average photodrama pretending to depict episodes in our development as a nation deals principally with the stale and insipid love affairs of a young lady we do not know with a young man we care nothing about. All that we are profoundly affected by—the sufferings and struggles of American pioneers—are often presented as side issues of minor importance.

Such plays are more than silly and they are far from entertaining. The Father of Our Country is the usual victim and is shown as anything but the noble, dignified and splendid leader that he was. I would like to see a portrayal of Washington during his earlier fights, those with Indians, and how about Tippecanoe? Our great leaders must be shown in their reverses, in their bitter disappointments, with hard earned victories instead of an unimportant young man hugging and mugging his girl. Such plays would tell our story abroad, be educational at home, and could be made as replete with thrilling incident as those of no purpose.

I noticed in the Ranch 101 headliners that the directors gave careful attention to nearly all minor details—they obtained superior ensemble effects by skilled handling of individual features, and I have reason to think that they could bring out historical plays of thrilling interest such as would go straight to the hearts of American people with accuracy of detail. These would be all the more interesting because of the larger bodies of men handled and would not belittle episodes we have all been taught to reverence.

I strongly approve their presentations of foreground action. In most hand-to-hand battles of the stage the supers fall dead like stiffs and never move. In real life, while the fighting male is mad with fury, he rises and goes at it as long as he has a breath and a heart beat left. Man never gives up the ghost without a last determined struggle. If anything these small-scope actions could be intensified. The audience is the same in primitive instincts as that which watched the gladiatorial contests at Rome.

I would also suggest finer treatment of interiors. The novelist who thinks he is a realist when he describes the eccentricities of an uninteresting character, is like the director who is too limited in his interior fittings. The idealist is nearer truth. He typifies. He shows us in a fascinating way what was more or less universal in character and settings, enriching the picture to make a deeper impression. I suggest grand exteriors rather than those of meager fidelity, and unifying all that was characteristic of a certain group of settings. This raises the value of the photodrama at home and interest in it abroad. I used to know a dramatic critic who had only one point of view "Is it true to life?" He was narrowed down to approval only in case the play was true to life as he saw it when he was sober, which was next to never. One man will recognize one detail of a setting as true, another will recognize another detail, and universal recognition goes to redundancy rather than poverty of interior furnishings.

Dramatic Moment in "The Crisis."

There is another matter to be considered in the selection of exteriors and arrangements of interiors, the after effect of a picture as a refining and inspiring source of pleasure. If it is deeply enjoyed by the audience, inhaled like a breath of pure and refreshing air, the drawing power of the picture is enhanced. All the pioneers did not live like dogs; many of them had better furniture than is ordinarily seen on the stage in parlor sets, and the houses were not shacks or log cabins. If we must be true to nature let us be true to the best there is in it and be more typically American.

The New York Motion Picture Company has not gone to extremes one way or the other in revealing the characteristics of the American Indian. There has been a lot of slush written and voiced on this subject, but here is a middle course that is nicely balanced. One of the Indians of the company—he enacts the part of a chief—is a star actor. His gestures and movements are a source of perpetual study. The directors have apparently let Lo play his own role and he does it to perfection. The chief is quite as good in comedy as tragedy—a delight in one and impressive in the other.

I must take off my hat to the directors for showing the pioneer as he was, one of the hardest fighters in the world, pitted against a barbarian who would have swept the barbarians of Europe from the face of the earth. The early settler was a man, every inch of him, and the iron in his blood has descended to those who promulgated the Monroe doctrine. From him came the soldiers who freed the country from British rule and fought every war for liberty since then, who took under their protection the unhappy children of all nations, and at least tried to give them opportunity to enjoy life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

BISON FEATURES FOR SPECIAL RELEASE.

Notwithstanding the excellence of the series of two-reel "Bison 101" pictures, commented upon in the foregoing article by Mr. Harrison, the New York Motion Picture Company found it impossible to obtain adequate returns for their labors by releasing them in the usual way through the Sales Company. After extensively advertising these pictures they were unable to obtain more than fourteen orders from the exchanges. Realizing that they would sustain an enormous loss if they permitted them to be distributed in this way, the New York Motion Picture Company set about to find a more satisfactory market. The plan finally adopted was to give exclusive territory to a select list of exchanges and to increase the prices of the pictures to fifteen cents per foot. Strange to say this plan met with almost instant approval on the part of the exchanges, and, where Bison had received orders for but fourteen prints, it had no trouble in placing fifty on the exclusive plan. The entire territories of the United States and Canada have now been disposed of and the success of the Bison features is assured. Beyond question these double reel Bisons are the finest western subjects ever made by any motion picture manufacturer. Their reception by the public is certain to be most satisfactory.

STAMP OUT THE "CRIME POSTERS."

I read a recent editorial in The Moving Picture World which I must heartily endorse. It said, among other things, "It sickens us every time to look at the huge banners displayed on the streets of New York, wherever the traffic is heaviest, announcing motion pictures of 'famous bandits' and 'terrible crimes.' Millions of people pass these places, see these awful banners (and posters), and not unreasonably conclude that the motion picture is little better than a pictorial Police Gazette in motion. Thus, for the sake of a few wretched nickels, incalculable harm is done to this great industry."

There are plenty of high-class films to feature without resorting to the worst for advertising purposes; and if crime pictures must be shown, it is poor policy to feature them. The time has passed when the exhibitor must appeal to the small boy and to the ruffian to increase attendance. We must all work together to uplift the motion picture business and to attract the better element.—From "Musings of the Photoplay Philosopher."

DURGIN BUYS ANOTHER HOUSE.

H. H. Durgin, owner of the Spa Picture Theater at Pittsfield, Mass., has purchased the Star Picture Theater, at Putnam, Conn. The Star has a seating capacity of 1,100, and will be managed by A. W. Atkins. Mr. Durgin also owns the Globe Theater at Springfield, Mass. He has been very successful as a theater manager, though he has been in the amusement business but one year.

OBSERVATIONS.

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

An exchange says that Hungry is the name of a restaurant proprietor in Brooklyn; Lamb & Bacon are retail butchers in the Bronx; Root & Budd have nurseries near Rochester, N. Y.; and in Newark, N. J., Foote & Wear are dealers in shoes. Why not make the list more complete and say that two of the greatest factors in the motion picture business are Frame & Focus?

The Lyceum Theater in Manhattan is the latest of the regular Greater New York playhouses to be converted into a motion picture house. The Paul J. Rainey pictures of an African hunt opened there on April 15th. These pictures and others of a similar character have made a marked impression on audiences at the Museum of Natural History. In several instances the audiences numbered over 1,500 people, composed mostly of society persons. Presumably the success attained there led to the Lyceum Theater undertaking.

How long the pictures will run in that house is a question. I know they are much sought from an educational point of view and with the aid of judicious publicity their run may be given longer life than believed on first thought. There cannot be changes of programme with such subjects to keep alive, or renew, interest as is done in other branches of the picture exhibiting business, and for that reason whatever success is attained during the present engagement will depend entirely upon the pictures themselves. After the people get going will the pictures be sufficiently strong to "keep them coming?" I will make no prediction on this score. The Coronation and Durbar pictures have established a precedent that knocks into a cocked hat the theory that pictures without change of programme cannot pay. There is one thing in which confidence can be placed. If the present venture is a success at all, if but for a few weeks, the Lyceum will be continued as a picture house.

Many people in the theatrical line are trying to make others believe that the invasion of the Broadway theaters by motion pictures is simply one of the freak ventures that are made in the amusement field, but the argument is not backed up by facts. If the regular theatrical season was over and the houses taken had been closed for the summer, the undertakings could be more readily accepted as experiments. All the converted houses had regular bookings at the time the pictures went into them, and the regular season had several weeks to run. Add to this the fact that there is no dearth of regular attractions and it becomes quite convincing that the conversion of the places was made because it is believed that from a business standpoint the pictures formed the best attraction.

* * *

Never in the history of local theatricals have times been so hard with the people who make their living on the stage. This is attributed directly to the motion pictures and is the strongest possible refutation of the reports so frequently given circulation that public interest in the picture is fast diminishing. One's sympathies are aroused when the list of idle professional people is viewed. Scores of them are applying daily at the studios of the film makers for engagements, and among them are some of the most popular and best people in the business. All the studios report long waiting lists, and the successful new applicants are few in number. The amateur now finds himself practically barred from the field. The producers can fill all vacancies at a moment's notice from the ranks of people who can "make good" on account of professional experience.

* * *

A real estate dealer visited a film exchange a few days ago and left with the manager a long list of places he had for disposal as available sites for picture houses. He remarked it was strange that the large theaters, with the attendant big rentals and other expenses, should be sought when there are so many good places in the market that could be made perfect picture places. The real estate people are responsible for the very thing of which this dealer complains. Not long ago one of the leading exhibitors of this city sought a site, but the price he was asked was prohibitive. The brokers knew his line of business and correctly surmised his reason for desiring the property. The exhibitor commenced fishing and with the aid of dummies secured the property at a saving of about $22,000.

* * *

The motion picture "game," as some call it, has settled down to a business proposition. The speculative feature has been wiped out. In former days a man with small capital would secure a lease and open a nickelodeon. He would soon receive flattering offers and turn over the place with a good bonus in his jeans. With his increased capital another place was opened and another profitable sale made. This operation was repeated as fast as new leases could be secured and transfers made. Many of the men who head the list of big exhibitors owe their success to this turn-over process. But those days are gone where the woodbine twineth. You do not see Loew, Fox and such people who have acquired picture houses in quantities juggling them from one hand to another. Their holdings, as well as many others throughout the country, are manipulated in practically the same manner as the chains of restaurants and mercantile places are. No one place is counted upon to give big returns. All that is looked for is a fair dividend on the respective investments, and when the investment is made the same care and attention is given to the consideration of values as is accorded transactions in other lines.

Anybody who tries to break into the picture exhibiting business with the idea that a single house is going to bring him a fortune on a moderate investment makes himself a joke in the eyes of his fellowmen. Many exhibitors are getting good returns, but none of them are taking from the box office what most people imagine they do. By this is meant there is not a single house in the country that is a gold mine. It is true that more people are patronizing picture houses now than during any other period in the history of the business, but it is also true that there has been a marked increase in the rentals and running expenses of the houses that have derived the benefit accruing from the increased patronage. As leases have expired landlords have raised their rents, the operators are getting better salaries, considerable money has been spent in making and maintaining alterations to comply with the municipal regulations; films are changed more frequently and the class of service has been advanced to a grade that was not used in the earlier days, and many other changes have taken place that will ultimately bring the picture theaters to the chain basis even more generally than they are now. Many fail to see this. That is the reason they predict failure for a large theater transformed into a picture house. They overlook the collective feature. The individual who clears but $30 a week on his house naturally feels that is a beggarly return for his investment, time, worry and labor. It is certainly a poor house that shows such a profit. But if a chain of 20 houses show the same amount of profit, meagre as it is, for the sake of argument, it means $600 on the week and an annual stipend of $31,200. Get me?

NEWSPAPER MAN BECOMES PICTURE MAN.

Edmund J. Geehan, for fifteen years associated with the Galveston News and Tribune, has resigned his position on the latter paper to embark in the picture theater business. Mr. Geehan has purchased the Colonial Theater at Temple, Texas, from Woodall & Carr, and assumed charge of the house April 1, changing its name to The Rex, and opened it on April 13. The house is but eight months old, seats 350, and is modern in its equipment.

Mr. Geehan is a close and regular reader of the Moving Picture World and believes in advertising, in which line he proposes to introduce some novel ideas. It is possible that readers of the World may have the benefit of some of those ideas later.

WATERBURY ISSUES A DEFI.

J. M. Waterbury, expert long distance piano player, takes exceptions to the report of the performance of Miss Hubbell at Bridgeport, Conn., reported in the Moving Picture World of April 6. He claims that the so-called contest was not a contest and that the story given the World by Mr. Kinder is not true in every respect. Mr. Waterbury says that he has been playing the pictures for a number of years throughout the country and now he wishes to issue a challenge to Miss Hubbell for a contest for $200 or $300 a side. Mr. Kinder is requested to "take notice."

Making One-Reel Features.

HERE'S a chatty letter from Carey Wilson, who helps run the Criterion Theater, in Rutherford, N. J. He was bewailing the fact that there were so few feature reels and it was partly through correspondence with him that we suggested making an occasional feature out of a regular release that would be strong enough to make good for extra booming. That he accepted the suggestion with more enthusiasm than tempered judgment is shown by the following:

> Dear Teacher—Your comment in the current World duly read and appreciated, with the one exception concerning "One-reel features." Bless your ever lovin' li'l heart, I do make features on regular releases when they are worth it. I ran "How Motion Pictures Are Made and Shown" on the eighth day after released and I ran it with some advertising and featuring, just as if it was a "regular" feature. Of course it pleased to quite a considerable extent, but it hardly could be advertised up to the point of a big-time affair like "Two Orphans" without the audience noting that it was only a single reel and hardly as deserving of three-reel advertising. My audience saw the difference in the film itself and I had not a few comments on same. Did the same thing, with the same results "For the Commonwealth" and received several unfavorable criticisms from people who in my estimation are quite qualified to comment from the point of the average patron.
> I tried making a feature out of my newest reel, not only two or three times a week, but for a short time every day in the week, and while the audience came out strong with the expectation of seeing something very big, I feel that I can't do it very often. And for the simple reason of "Wolf, Wolf." If I start to use a regular release for a feature even once a week, what am I going to do when I get a corking big one. How are my audiences to know that this is the real thing and before I have only been stalling with an excuse? I suppose you will say that there are degrees of advertising (like the degrees of sinning), but with me there ain't no such animal. If I want to get people out for anything extra, I have to go the limit and make them be afraid to stay away on that night for fear they will miss something. So that I must go to the same degree for practically everything.
> I wish you would understand conditions here. We are giving an awful big show for the money here, but New York is too gosh darned near that they will go over there and maybe see the same kind of a show if I am not careful. And another thing. To get my advertising forces mustered up to get the right effect I must have at least twelve or fourteen days' notice. This sounds unreasonable, but when I get you out here I am going to make you listen to some of the disadvantages I must fight. Now, of course, when I book a special, I can get as much advance notice as possible, but how am I going to get two weeks' notice on a regular release and get it repeatedly on my so-called feature. Mr. Etris, of the Actograph Branch, is more than kind in doing all he can for us, but on the level, there are limits and I wouldn't want to ask that kind of a concession from an exchange unless I was using about a steen hundred a week film service. This situation puts it distinctly up to the regular special feature films and I grab these as soon as issued.

Don't Overdo It.

The daily feature is an impossibility, the weekly feature not always practicable, but at the same time we think that a reel like "How Motion Pictures Are Made and Shown," can be boomed to a point where people will want to see it and we believe that "how motion pictures are made" is a more interesting topic to the average photoplay patron than "The Two Orphans," with a reel and a half to each orphan.

It may be necessary to explain to the patron that it is only a one-reel feature instead of three thousand feet, but that can be done. Don't overboom, but boom properly. Tell them that you have something they want to see. It's only a single reel feature, but it's a mighty interesting single reel. Boom it as a single reel and no one can charge you with false pretenses. The length of a subject should not be the standard, but the interest the subject rouses. Try something like this:

> WANT TO SEE MOTION PICTURES MADE?
> It's mighty interesting to see a photoplay made, and the Edison Company will take us through their big plant and show the process from start to finish.
>
> It answers all the questions you've been wanting to ask. You don't have to travel to the studio. They bring the studio to you.
>
> The most interesting single reel feature we have offered.
>
> Criterion Theater
>
> One night only— Wednesday— One night only.

Length Should Not Count.

Mr. Wilson argues that local conditions do not permit him to graduate his advertising, but we think that even where strenuous appeal must be made there are graduations of praise that can lift the single reel above its fellows where this prominence is deserved.

Some time next month the Edison Company is going to release a one-reel "Treasure Island," done from the Stevenson novel. It would have been better in three, since the thousand-foot limitation cramps the story and leaves gaps in the narrative, but surely "Treasure Island" is more valuable to an exhibitor than some ineffective love story that is put out because it was made and the company must hold to its releases. In the same catalog will be some of the Harry Furniss stories. Mr. Furniss is probably the best known caricaturist in the world. It would be absurd to argue that because these are all single reel features they are no better than a cowboy story with five inches of plot and 999 feet of hard riding.

The alert exhibitor will find plenty of material that can be made into a feature if only he is careful to tell just how much of a feature it is and to distinguish in his advertising between the one and the three-reel release. You are dishonest to yourself if you do not get the fullest value out of the reel. It is impossible to make a daily feature purely through advertising, but if you make an especial brag when you have a regular release worth bragging about you'll get more than you pay for without having cheated anyone.

Such a Lucky Man!

Will W. Cox writes in reply to our recent comment! It will be noted that Mr. Cox is fortunate in not having to fight opposition, which does not, however, prevent him from hustling. He says:

> Quite a few exhibitors have sent me requests for my laundry slips since you printed the article about them in your department, and I was very glad to accommodate them, and hope they were of some use. Many of them sent me copies of their ideas also, which may be useful to me in time. I think you should encourage managers in various parts of the country to get together by mail and exchange ideas, even though the men may be absolute strangers and located hundreds of miles apart.
> I figure that anything that helps the moving picture industry helps me, and anything (of a business nature), that helps me helps the moving picture business, for I intend to stay with it.
>
> One thing about my laundry slips that you commented on I will explain, and I think that in a small way it will change your opinion in the matter. That is in regard to using Elite cuts exclusively. I am not situated as the majority of managers are with a dozen or so competitors, for I am running the only moving picture show in Jackson, therefore do not have to pound the name in as hard as I might under other conditions. Then I had but one Elite cut, and had a supply of the other kind assorted and so made use of them. I didn't use what I wanted, but what I had.
> Enclosed I am sending you a few of my reading notices and ads from the daily paper. I run a five-inch double column ad by the month, with a daily change, and also have the privilege of putting in a "reader" of reasonable size daily. (That's where we "country cousins" have the advantage over the city shows). I try to make my "readers" look as though they were newspaper stories instead of "box-office" write-ups.
> I am sending these to you for comment. They are not my best, nor are they my worst, but are about the average. Some of the clippings will show that I draw on my imagination at times like our friend Phillips, of Ft. Worth, who advertised that Caruso produced "Il Trovatore"; at other times I get my information from the "Comments On the Films" in the Moving Picture World.
>
> Your advertising talks are "first aid to a sinking box-office report" in many cases and I think they will be of great benefit to hundreds of managers who, though they won't send in their work for correction, will absorb lots of valuable information in reading what others have done, and read your criticisms on them. It's up to you to bring them out of their shells, if only for their own good.

In Times of Peace.

In times of peace prepare for war, and the fact that the Elite has a clear field is one of the reasons why the name should be built up now so that when the inevitable opposition does arrive it will be hard for the new-comer. Now is the time to have a set of name cuts made and a supply of electros from each cut. These used on every piece of paper will soon make the name a household word.

We like Mr. Cox's paper advertising. He has the right idea when he explains that he tries to give the readers the aspect of general news. He not only tries, but he accomplishes what he sets out to do. It is not the usual run of puffery for "the genial and enterprising manager," nor are the subjects fulsomely praised. It is newspaper material set in newspaper style and many of the stories have an actual news twist.

A point we particularly like is that when a feature reel was lost in some express car as much space was taken for a warning that the reel was not there as was used to advertise the substitute features. It pays to play fair with the patron because it holds business. Not all exhibitors can write in the newspaper style, but they can play fair, and a few dollars spent in advertising the reel you haven't got will sometimes bring more business than the money spent on a feature, though it will be distributed over the year and not come all at once where it can be seen readily.

Likes the Idea.

A number of exhibitors have taken up the Chaney idea of exchanging admission for ideas looking to the improvement of the house. As usual, the Cameraphone, of Pittsburgh, is in line promptly and makes this offer:

A SIX MONTHS' PASS FREE.

> We are on the alert to gather in any ideas that will add to the betterment of the East End Cameraphone and in order to secure them will offer to any one giving us what we think is a good suggestion a six-months' pass. No doubt we will receive suggestions that we cannot or do not care to use, but if we can obtain ideas we deem of value we will be delighted to exchange passes for them.
> Address all letters to Manager, East End Cameraphone.

It may not be possible to obtain much material, but it is good advertising and it will pay to accept a few of the best ideas anyhow and advertise the names of the winners in the Bulletin.

More Good Work.

And we like this announcement clipped from the same source. The idea, it seems, did not work out the way the house anticipated, but the admission that it did not will pave the way for some missionary work along these lines and perhaps bring the audience to a proper viewpoint in the course of time. It runs:

OUR PATRONS EVIDENTLY DID NOT APPROVE.

> Last week we ordered 4,000 inserts printed and placed in our programs asking our patrons if they approved of an evening each week devoted to travel and industrial pictures, at an admission of ten cents for adults and five cents for children. We asked for names and addresses of those approving the idea and while we received a number of answers from many of our best supporters, yet we received only one-tenth as many as we expected. Apparently the idea is not a popular one, and we have decided not to try it just now. The results were a surprise and a disappointment to us because we had prided ourselves on catering to the most intelligent moving picture audiences in the city and we thought they would jump at the chance of seeing the same class of pictures for ten cents that Lyman H. Howe charges fifty cents for. However, we want to please the majority and of course will not offer any program that is not popular. Each day, though, our program will contain one travel, industrial or some picture of an educational type.
> The same rule applies to the Victor records we secure for the Auxetophone. Many of them will be popular songs and melodies, but each month we will offer some records of the best artists.

The Liberty Does It.

The Liberty Theater, Salt Lake City, seems to have the trick of making a feature. "How Washington Crossed the Delaware" is played upon a special sheet, a grade of paper being used that permits the running of 120 screen half-tones. They not only use a script title on all their printing, but inch-high cuts of the Statue of Liberty are employed to further fix the name. You can't get away from the fact that it is the Liberty Theater, and even if the circular is not read it at least serves a part of its advertising appeal in making the name known. They give a five-reel show with a ten-piece orchestra and pipe organ. They know how to make the best of what they have, and they get good stuff to start with.

A New Headliner.

John A. Steinson, of the Forum Theater, McAlester, Okla., sends in an advertisement in which the greater space is devoted to a new air purifier. We commented last week on featuring a steel ceiling, but we think this is in a different class, since it is not only a novelty, but a strong talking point. It is good strong talk all the way through. Mr. Steinson writes that he has a contract for 3,000 inches a year, and if he uses it all in this straight-from-the-shoulder talk it is money well spent. You may not have an ozonitor, but you should talk about your ventilation now that the hot weather is coming on. Here is the special part of the advertisement:

OZONE.

> The Forum has recently been equipped with an electric ozonitor, a new invention that will provide the theater with better air than you breathe outdoors. Everyone knows how lightning in a thunder storm clarifies the atmosphere and that is due to the action of ozone. The ozonitor imitates the action of lightning and diffuses a constant supply of pure ozone throughout the theater. No chemicals are used in the apparatus. Silent discharges of electricity restore free ozone to the atmosphere.
> Ozone is an intense oxidizer and has a great power of destroying offensive odors.—Century Dictionary.
>
> Ozone is oxygen raised to a higher energy.
> Ozone puts health in the air.
> Ozone has a slight odor like that of chlorin.
>
> Ozone reduces humidity.
> Ozone oxidizes and destroys bad odors.
>
> The Forum has always been provided with better ventilation than any other building in McAlester. Two large exhaust fans replace all the air in the room every four minutes. Fifteen 16-inch wall fans diffuse the ozonized air throughout the room. Ice is used during extremely hot weather. Large formaldehyde lamps are burned in the theater regularly at night. The management is indebted to the local health officers for advice on ventilation and sanitation. To any one interested we will be glad to show the operation of the new apparatus.

Surprise Uses Stories.

The Surprise Theater, South Bend, Ind., one of the hustling houses, has taken up the Imp stories from the Implet and is running them in its program when the reel can be had. The use of the story form (credit for which should go to J. Stuart Blackton, of the Vitagraph) is on the increase and the Imp weekly story is useful to exhibitors of Independent films who wish a program feature. The Surprise has changed to a coated paper with a light tint and looks better than ever.

Small But Effective.

Alfred Fiedler, of Fairyland, Anaheim, Cal., sends some folders and this letter:

> Enclosed I take pleasure in sending you a few specimens of my weekly program, or more properly speaking, of my three-day run of each week, and would be pleased to have you inspect and comment on the same.
> I distribute them in the house Saturday, Sunday and Monday nights, and have them delivered to the residences the next three days by eight boys, who are instructed to put one in the house mailbox, or under the door, but under no circumstances to throw one in the yard, and as I have good reliable boys who do this work for me all the time I get good results—far superior to the ordinary handbill, which in most cases is thrown away without being read.
>
> By way of remuneration I allow the boys to come to the show as often as they please, excepting Saturday and Sunday nights, when owing to the small seating capacity (225), I have to deny them the privilege these two nights.
> However, an addition is now being made to Fairyland, which will, I hope, be completed in about two weeks, giving me nearly double the number of seats, when the above restriction will be withdrawn.
> I use the bulletin forwarded by the various manufacturers for synopsis on program. The cost of the program is covered by ad.

The folders are on colored stock of fairly good quality, well printed and well displayed, except that the front page is not made to work as hard as it should. The page is 5 by 6¼.

Using the Space.

The front page is well set with straight type and rule work, which is better than the average ornamentation to be had in small offices. The name of the theater stands out well, the location is clearly stated and the dates are displayed in separate boxes. About half of the front page is taken up with the statement that the films are supplied by the General Film Company. This might better be given to the star reel. It is done in one case with the Equitable Building fire, but it should be done right along, the feature reel being played up in a few strong, terse sentences.

The program falls on page two and below that is a brief statement of the times of performance, days for change of program and other information clearly displayed. The third page gives the story of the featured reel and the back page is devoted to the advertisement of some local concern. It is an orderly and well planned arrangement, save for the exception noted, and with the careful distribution should be effective. The comment concerning the throwing of circulars into yards is a point well taken. If your circulars are a nuisance they will not have their proper effect. The circulars are not pretentious, but they are wholly creditable.

Costly But Effective.

Here is a letter from S. G. Smith, of the Theatorium, New Lexington, Ohio. It is self-explanatory and shows that Mr. Smith is alive to the possibilities of advertising. He writes:

> I am enclosing a handbill that I just sent out and under the circumstances it has worked wonders. This is a small town and I have always run the machine myself, but last week while attending the convention at Dayton, my operator in charge burned four reels of film and there was a lively scramble to get out of the theater. I got in communication at once with the local papers and asked them to write it up, making it as easy as they could, and the enclosed clippings will show to you the difference in the two papers and I want to state that since the fire my business has been at least 35 per cent. better than before. People realize now that the theater is safe and where I had a few knockers before, they all have their shoulders to the wheel now and are boosting.

Meeting It Squarely.

This is the essential part of the advertisement to which reference is made. It appears at the bottom of the usual house bill and the quiet handling of the situation is to be commended. The two articles were so widely at variance that Mr. Smith had good grounds for bitter complaint. Instead he says:

A WORD ABOUT THE FIRE.

> There has been a great many stories circulated as to the cause of the fire we had last week, and some people seem to accuse Mr. Harry Wright; but I wish to exonerate Mr. Wright and Mr. Gratziana from all blame in this matter, as it was simply an accident that might happen with anybody. While the loss of the films is considerable, it was practically the only damage done, and I am very glad that no one was injured. You have seen this accident happen under conditions that could not possibly have been worse and it has only proved what I have always contended, that our theater is a safe one.
> One other thing I would like to call attention to is the fact that whenever you read an account of a film fire in some of the yellow journals, they always head the article with: "FILM EXPLOSION," and that is why so many people lose their heads and start a panic when a film catches fire. You have seen this accident and know for yourselves that a film does not explode, but only burns quickly. Our new fireproof machine is expected in this week and we want you all to witness a free demonstration of same next Saturday evening in front of Theatorium.

Just in passing, if the newspapers only told the truth instead of making sensational and wholly untrue statements, there would be nothing heard of fire panics. If there ever is a disaster, the papers will be almost wholly to blame.

The PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT
CONDUCTED BY EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

If You Please, Double Spacing.

WE will appreciate it if those who are good enough to favor us with contributions will add to the favor by using the double spacer when they write. Turn the page, if you want to, but let it come so that we can put in the printer's marks without recopying the script.

Essanay Changes.

Norman Macdonald now signs himself as Editor of the Essanay Company and H. Tipton Steck is in charge of the advertising end. In a recent letter to an inquirer as to when Essanay would resume buying Mr. Macdonald wrote that he thought they would be in the market again along in August.

Now It's McCloskey.

Mrs. Lillian M. Rubenstein has resigned as the editor of the Lubin Company and L. S. McCloskey, formerly her assistant, has been advanced to her desk. Mr. McCloskey has written some capital scripts for the Lubin Company.

Adler Is Aggrieved.

Bertram Adler, of the Thanhouser Company, feels aggrieved because the leaflet that is published as an adjunct to one of the Photoplay bureaus states that he writes all the scripts for the Thanhouser Company. He was also accused of being an actor. We cheerfully assure an interested public that Mr. Adler is most emphatically not an actor and also that he does not write the Thanhouser photoplays. These are prepared by the photoplay staff.

Dr. Stockton a Member.

The Rev. E. Boudinot Stockton has been elevated to membership in the Use No Hooks' Club. Recently he received from the Pathe Freres a script, the first page of which had been crumpled and soiled. He sent the sheet to Mr. Berst and promptly received from the photoplay editor a courteous apology and a recopied sheet to replace that marred. It was a small matter and complaint was made on principle, but a few courteously phrased complaints lodged with the executives will soon work a reform in offending studios. But complaint should be courteous and not smart.

Why Not Leader?

Spectator, in the Dramatic Mirror, sides with Charles Gaskill in his contention that "interscript" be substituted for "sub-title," "caption," or "leader." Spectator thoughtfully remarks that leader is the strip of blank film sometimes used to thread up the film in the machine. We would point out that a leader is also a thing to lead a dog around with or the tin pipe that leads from the roof gutter to the ground. Sometimes a leader is a political boss and sometimes it is a mule at the head of a pack train. If a leader can be any one of these things, why cannot it be a word or words leading from one scene to another in a photoplay?

Assuredly it is more definite than "interscript," since in a newspaper sense a leader may either be the principal editorial or the full face lines breaking a story into sections. We object to the use of scenario on the ground that it is misleading and because a better word has been provided. Photoplay has been adopted in France, England and Germany, and it is compact and comprehensive, but "interscript" is ungainly and indefinite. An interscript—if there ever is an interscript—would properly mean anything interpolated in the script whether it be insert, leader, or bust picture.

We are willing to exchange "leader" for any more suitable word, but we can't quite "see" that interscript or the alternative "inscript." It is nondescript.

Listen to This.

A couple of weeks ago S. Walter Bunting discovered that the Nestor Company had produced one of his scripts without having sent him a check.

Instead of frothing at the mouth and denouncing the Nestor Company as thieves, he wrote a courteous note calling attention to the oversight and suggesting that it was probably due to the upset condition following the untimely death of their photoplay editor and the reconstruction of the system.

Before the letter could get to California the check arrived.

Now the moral of this is that it was very clearly shown that the company made payment without having been urged. Suppose that a couple of days afterward they had received a denunciatory letter from Mr. Bunting. It would have closed a market to the author, from which this second moral may be deduced that it doesn't pay to damn around until you have really good reason, and even then it doesn't always pay.

Just hug this moral to your breast. You may need it yourself some time.

We Like This Man.

Because we like the breezy philosophy of M. D. Stilson, who runs the Schuyler Opera House, at Cobleskill, N. Y., we are passing along his advice. He takes a sane and sensible view of things. There are five men of whom we know, not employed in a studio, who make a living out of photoplays and Emmett Campbell Hall even bought an automobile, but the time is not yet here when photoplays alone will keep the pot boiling, so write photodramas "because you like to" and wait for the day that is coming. Mr. Stilson has the floor:

> Yes, I am one of them. One of those great and wonderful productions known as "The Writer of the Photopaly." I have no "kick" to make. The Lord knows, you get enough of them from would-be writers, and now and then a would-be editor, without my saying a word.
> I write photoplays because I like to. I enjoy it. I am not in the game for a livelihood, nor with the idea of ever having film manufacturers fall over each other after my manuscript. I, like the others, have had all kinds of troubles, but at the same time have sold a goodly number of the photoplays I have written. I never say a word when my photoplay comes back. I just spend a few cents for postage, mail her out again, and keep it up until I find some manufacturer foolish enough to buy it. Never lost my head and "called" an editor but once. You will remember that at one time a company in Chicago were featuring the "Hank" and "Lank" pictures. At that time I mailed the same firm a comedy. It came back, and also a letter, in which they informed me that they were returning the manuscript, because the story was improbable. Think of it! Could anything be more improbable than "Hank" and "Lank"?
> My advice to writers is this: If you are in the game, be in it for the love of it; the enjoyment of the work. Do not start with the idea of keeping a wife and several small children out of the large checks you will receive. If you cannot stand disappointment, never mail out a piece of manuscript. Good ones are sure to come back sometime. The editor does not know it all, but there is no use of spending the price of a stamp to tell him so. He will not believe it.

The Rights of Authors.

We hear a great deal about the "rights" of authors in letters from our correspondents, but we've never seen these "rights" clearly stated, and we are going to start a little list that is subject to correction and emendation. Here is our idea of the Author's Creed.

He has the right to courteous treatment from an editor so long as his own attitude shall be courteous.

He has the right to have his script passed upon as quickly as is conformable to the established practise of the studio to which he sends it.

He has the right to expect his script to be returned to him in a reasonably clean and orderly condition, provided that a stamped and self-addressed envelope has been provided for that purpose.

He has the right to make inquiry as to the fate of a manuscript after a reasonable period of time has elapsed (from four to eight weeks), but he has not the right to peremptorily demand the return of his work by return mail. Having submitted his story to editorial treatment he should permit it to be handled in due course. Where inquiry is made a return envelope for reply should invariably be enclosed.

He has the right to refuse to do business with any concern whose methods of doing business do not meet with his approval, but having opened negotiation, he must abide by office rules.

Stuck on the Twelfth.

If your photoplay has come back so often that you get sick of the sight of it, read this, from a Western correspondent, and take heart of grace. He says:

> Just a confirmatory bit in support of a recent suggestion you made in your helpful department.
> After being rejected eleven times by as many manufacturers I re-wrote one of my photoplays, gave it a new name and sent it out. It seemed to me that it contained a good idea, and my opinion was justified. In just five days I received a check for $20. That it was purchased by one of the firms that had rejected it in its previous incarnation, is interesting, but not specially significant.
>
> Perhaps this experience may have a tendency to bolster up the waning courage of some oft-rejected brother. I presume I merely give voice to the gratitude of numberless photoplaywrights when I thank you for the constant assistance your counsel is to me.

Stung Twice.

C. R. S., of Columbus, seems to have a hard-working Jonah. He writes:

> As for the idea of any company stealing your plots, listen to this: A few days ago, I started for a mail box with two neatly written scripts original with me, and on the way stopped at two picture houses. At each I saw one of my "original" plots on the screen. So if you get yours mailed first, then see it, remember my experience and don't be so ready to yell "thief."

Twice in the same place, or rather two places, is getting pretty hard hit, but basic plots are few and the only thing to do is to make your own version of a familiar plot so original that there is small likelihood of duplication.

Even at that it is not always easy to skip the deadly parallel.

Not a Member of This Club.

It is clearly to be seen that the writer of the appended letter is not a member of the Use No Hooks' Club. It is equally apparent that he is not convinced that the photoplay business is a branch of the Inferno. Read what he says:

> I have read your reply through your paper to my letter relative to my photoplay (a comedy) submitted to the Bison Film Company. I realize now that it was, as you say, foolish in me to submit such a photoplay to this company, but at that time I did not know that there was such a paper as the THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD on the market. How was I to smell that they did not take such > stories? I have written to them and trust that they will reply shortly. Have you any publication on hand or can you refer me to one, that gives in a general way just what the various companies desire? Of course, your paper has been an invaluable source of information on the subject, and your column on the photoplaywrights has been worth the price of your paper alone. Indeed, I would pay that to read your remarks relative to the "Rubes" who growl about their rejected stuff. I often get my photoplay back much the worse for wear, but I merely retype the first and last pages. Most editors, I find, are extremely courteous and seem to go out of the way to help me. Some of these chronic growlers ought to submit a story to some of the magazines. They would find here a very different reception. One particular magazine kept my story three months and when I wrote to them, their office boy sent back my ragged MS. with a "sassy" slip saying that it was sent back so that my friends could enjoy it, but that the editor had no use for it. As long as the photoplay editors treat men as they have in the past, I will have no "kick" coming. Will you please let me know whether you consider this paper too thin? I have been sending it around, but I have wondered whether it is not too thin.

There is no publication that can give the wants of the studios. The best way is to read the "Stories of the Films" in the back part of each issue of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD and deduce the answer from these. Sometimes a company will change its needs almost overnight. We are perfecting a plan to give more market news in this department, but there can be no book publication that can be kept up to date.

The question of thick or thin paper is more or less a matter of choice, but there is this hard and fast rule: The paper must not be so thin that the typewriting on under pages shows through the sheet being read. Our personal preference is for 20 pound paper, a ream of 8½ x 11 weighing five pounds. If a lighter paper is used it must not be so light as to be semi-transparent.

Those Infernal Green Stamps.

We are making two extracts from a letter from a newspaper man who proclaims himself no sorehead and yet who rids himself of these complaints:

> In the first place, in view of the fact that most firms are admittedly appealing for scripts to keep up to the demand for them, and this appeal is being extended to others than their own immediate contributors, it seems to me that the courtesy displayed is not all it should be in a good many cases. I submitted a synopsis recently to a leading Independent firm that was advertising widely for scripts. The editor approved and praised the synopsis and told me to go ahead with the scenario, stating the number of scenes he wanted, etc. I finished up the job quickly, and you can imagine my surprise when the photoplay was not only returned on the ground of unavailability, but I was also mildly rebuked for not sending stamps by the very editor that assigned me to the task?
> A week or so ago a Licensed firm refused to take one of my photoplays because there was a cent due on postage. And I am no stranger to this firm, having sold them a few stories. Would you consider this treatment courteous and friendly? As to the firms that hold scripts for months, refusing to give reports on them, I could relate a number of cases of this kind, which shows either very careless methods of handling the stories, or absolute indifference to the rights of authors for prompt consideration of their product.

You will notice that there was one cent due on the postage. We cannot understand how a newspaper man should send out a script with one cent due on it. This means a three or five-cent stamp where a four or six cent stamp was needed. The postal regulations very clearly state that the rate on first class matter is two cents for each ounce or fraction thereof. That is something even a schoolboy is supposed to know and yet scores of scripts are sent out with a two and one cent stamp on them and the senders wonder why it is that their scripts come back.

Since we are asked, we advance the opinion that a company is justified in refusing to pay the odd penny on the ground that an author who doesn't know the postal regulations probably doesn't know how to write a good story.

This matter of stamps is almost too small to be considered; indeed it would be too small to be considered were it not that so many beginners hurt their chances by displaying their unfamiliarity with the game they are playing.

It's only a two cent stamp, looking at it from the point of view of dollars and cents, but it's a confession of greenness that militates against success. It is the editorial rule the world over that a stamped and addressed envelope should accompany a manuscript if return is desired, and please note that it is a stamped and self-addressed envelope and not merely a couple of shopworn stamps half gummed to a corner of the first page of the script or left loose in the envelope to go into the waste basket along with the cover. Twenty-five envelopes cost fifteen cents. They may be had in two sizes, one just large enough to contain the script and another large enough to hold the first one without folding or creasing. If you can't invest the thirty cents wait until you can before you start to send out, but when you do send out send it out looking as though it came from someone who was qualified through experience and not fairly shrieking its ignorance of forms.

If you write to ask a question of an editor, send a stamped and addressed envelope. If you send in a request to a form sheet send a stamped and addressed envelope. If you send in a manuscript send a stamped and addressed envelope. Do it right and you'll have gone a good way toward gaining the editorial respect.

If you've sold hundreds of dollars' worth of scripts to the company it's all the more reason why you should conform to custom and not expect them to pay your stamp bill.

And don't think that the approval of a synopsis means the acceptance of the photoplay. It merely means that the editor will be glad to see the idea in complete form. If the work is properly done he will take it. If it is not, he won't. It's a bad plan to work from the synopsis. Send in the complete work and let it be judged, but if you do query with the synopsis remember that the work is done subject to approval unless you have an explicit order.

INQUIRIES

MISS K.—The "handsome young man" who played the king in Thanhouser's "Her Ladyship's Page," was Harry Benham. After this, "the man who played the king" will be ample identification.

LeR. C.—Vitagraph's "The Chains of an Oath" has not yet been released nor has a date been set. In the "Licensed" end the associated manufacturers set the time of release for two and three-reel subjects that the supply may be properly regulated. "Chains of an Oath" has not yet been scheduled.

L. W. L.—Kit, Kit and Kitty is Eclair's "The Letter with the Black Seals." John Troyano, George Larkin and Miss Muriel Ostriche had the leads.

MOETEN.—In the Great Northern's special, "The Call of a Woman," Mr Vlademar Psilander was Owen and Miss Augusta Blade was Annie. We cannot, as a rule, identify the European-made players, but this information is at hand.

A CORRECTION.—Mrs. William Kelley asks that it be stated that it was her child and not Baby Todd, who played in the "Call of the West." The Chicago office identified Baby Todd. She adds the information that it is Violette Kelley, that she is seven years of age and under contract to the Essanay Company.

M. V. B.—Since we do not answer Biograph questions, we do not tab up the information. Replies are made from a card catalogue and not from imperfect recollection of the film. Walter Storey, of the Board of Censors is the only man we know of who sees most all of the pictures. The Inquiry Editor does not even pretend to, but he owns the most comprehensive card system in existence. Since it seems proper to the Biograph to withhold all information on this side of the water, and give out information and named photographs in England, we would suggest that you make inquiry of English sources.

TOM.—What's your other name? We won't use it, but we like to see a full signature. Miss Julia M. Taylor was Juliet in Thanhouser's "Romeo and Juliet." We do not know the captain in "The Coffin Ship." Outdoor scenes should be indicated in photoplays, as "A Country Road," "Beside a River," etc. Francis Ford was the deserter in the Bison of that title. He was formerly with the Melies Company, but went to Bison when the Melies shut down to catch up with overproduction.

M. H.—Albert McGovern went from Lubin to the Powers Co., as a director. He was forced to leave the latter company last week on account of ill health.

J. W. E.—Other things being equal, the photoplay with exterior scenes in the majority is preferred at this season of the year and will "have the call" until September. See an early issue for a fuller explanation in The Photoplayer pages.

Miss H. K.—We will query concerning Miss Fields. Our latest advice is that the Essanay Western is in San Rafael. There is no definite time between the making of a picture and its release. We have seen a reel go out of the factory within ten days of its making and we have seen the negative lie for nearly a year. You can't average that up very well except to say that between two and three months generally elapses, though some companies have their June and July releases already dated. We are glad we made you happy with our last answers, but we've got to sadden your soul right now by positively and very firmly declining to state the "peculiar color" of Guy Coomb's eyes. We never noticed that they were a peculiar color, and we don't see how you arrive at that fact from seeing the black and white prints. We fancy that they are grey blue, which gives a peculiar actinic value without the eyes, in themselves, being peculiarly colored.

B. L. C.—See answer above. The Edison Company makes its historicals in the exact location, where modern improvement permits, and in a reproduction where it does not. For example, if they had made their Bunker Hill picture on Bunker Hill they would have had a fine view of the monument and a public school or a row of modern residences for a background, but with the ground plan in mind they found a location on Lake Champlain that almost exactly reproduced Bunker Hill as it was in '76. On the other hand the Ticonderoga picture was made in the actual old fort restored to its old time appearance. No Western company is located near San Francisco because San Francisco is afflicted with fogs. For that reason they all work in the vicinity of Los Angeles, where the conditions are almost ideal.

M. L. R.—Your correspondence school teacher stated the facts when he said it was not necessary to copyright stories. It is not really necessary and if the Townsend Bill goes through it is going to become impossible. Your personal belief differs from the beliefs of two persons of greater experience. The majority rules.

E. R. C.—We are going to write you when we get some time. We disapprove the nom-de plume on the general ground that it is not at all necessary. You miss the point of the extracting the sting paragraph. You will remember that that was a printed slip. The additional instances you offer were all written. There is a difference.

E. W. S.—We hate to say it, but "a pretty young girl with some propensity for acting" doesn't stand a ghost of a show of getting a job in a studio and the fact that she can write scenarios is merely an aggravation and not a palliation. We used to know a girl once who had a job. Then she acquired the idea she could write photoplays and that last cost her three jobs in two years. Stick to the photoplay end. The average salary of a "bottom-rung beginner" is $3 a day when you work, and some weeks you work two and even three days. It used to be $5, but there were so many after the job that the pay was cut.

H. O. H.—The same girl played in both Imp and Bison pictures. She went from Imp to Bison. She is Miss Ethel Grandin.

A. W.—"M. P. Fan," "Constant Reader," "Anxious," and similar signatures are barred. Mr. Richardson is hired by the American Company to "play heavies." In theatrical parlance that means he is the villain in all productions and that's why he always is the man who does the dirty work. It is because he can look like a first class villain that he was hired for that line of parts and it is no reflection upon his personal character whatsoever that he looks his part. Honest, now, do you think that was a perfectly kind thing to say?

M. E. H.—It's three shades worse than pulling teeth to get any information out of the Pathe Freres, because the press man writes "don't know" on almost all questions, but a theatrical friend identifies the person marked in the cut as William Randall. Henry Walthall was with Pathe last summer but hustled over to Reliance again. Since Hal Reid hit the Reliance studio Mr. Walthall went to Pathe again. George L. Tucker went from Imp to Majestic and back to Imp, which is the reason you do not see him in some Majestics.

M. T. D.—You can purchase a set of the six leads of the American Company for one dollar, and this, of course, includes Mr. Kerrigan.

"CHURCH AND COUNTRY" (Edison), April 12.—The laws that govern good composition are not so complicated in any other form of art as they are in that of making motion pictures. Ours is a graphic art, not a dramatic art, although drama, in its genuine meaning, expresses anything made effective, humanly, by composition. The difference between a mere photograph of, say Abraham Lincoln, and a picture of him, is that one is only a reminder, while the other choses a climax and implies a beginning, middle and end; in other words, is dramatic. And after all this, in a motion picture, the art of photography comes in. A poorly taken picture is like a poorly printed etching—it may possibly be more effective, but probably it will be less. Good photography is essential to good pictures; many a poor story has been made pleasing by it. As for this picture, without harshly criticising its camera work, which isn't very bad, we can safely wish that it were better. The subject deserved better outside views than are on this print, at least.

The story deals with a frustrated plot to capture General Washington. Its hero is a minister who was not a Quaker, because his flock plainly wasn't; but who didn't believe a minister ought to fight. He is a patriot and the girl he loves wants him to join the army, but he won't. Later, in order to save Washington, he takes an active part; has a talk with the general; prays with him at a winter camp-fire at Valley Forge, and comes home to preach one more sermon in his church. He has a soldier's uniform under his black robe and stirs his congregation so that many of them also inlist. We felt that the first scenes dragged. The picture surely is instructive and valuable; a feature.

"THE SECRET OF THE MISER'S CAVE" (Kalem), April 12.—The miser's cave incident in the picture is the only novelty in the often told story of love on a ranch. The owner's daughter preferred the foreman and the Mexican was jealous. The foreman is sent for the payroll (it filled two salt bags) and the villain got his pals from the mountains to waylay him. He took refuge in a cave and was buried in by the Mexicans. The cave led under the hills to the mission church, once owned by the miser. The villain was there marrying the girl when, it must have been a day or so later, the altar swung back. The man in the cave, hacking his way out, had touched the spring. And there he was to confound the villain. The melodrama that sacrifices our sympathy for the heroine can hardly be truly effective. The photographs are good.

"A PIE WORTH WHILE" (Kalem), April 10.—It had the ranch payroll in it, that was why the pie was worth while. The picture, chiefly because of carelessness as to little things, fails to convince, there is no real suspense. Yet the early scenes keep interest awake wondering what it is all about, and, later, we wonder what is going to happen next. It is as strangely unreal as a dream. It is remarkable how much perfect photography adds to a picture, how much it adds to this. The camera work is marvelous. It makes the picture desirable.

"ABRAHAM'S SACRIFICE" (C. G. P. C.) April 12.—A colored Biblical picture telling the story of the patriarch's willingness to offer up his only son, Isaac, to the Lord. These pictures are sure features. This has the same good qualities as have the other C. G. P. C. films in the Biblical series. The others of this series were liked, this will be liked.

"THE CATARACTS OF ELKFARLEO" (C. G. P. C.), April 12.—This scenic on the same roll shows views of white waters boiling and seething through a mountain valley. The film is of a purple tint. The photography is sufficiently good, but the detail might have been clearer. It is very interesting.

"THE JOCULAR WINDS OF FATE" (Vitagraph), April 12.—A thoroughly well acted and delightful picture, giving us a very romantic comedy. We have never seen Mr. Costello to better advantage than in this role of a poverty stricken nobleman whose lawyer has told him he must marry money and who becomes chauffeur to a rich brewer with a daughter (Flora Finck) who will be a great heiress. Mrs. Kate Price is the brewer's wife. On the other side of the picture, there is a pretty heiress (Clara Kimbal Young) whose mother insists that she marry a duke (James Young). She simply won't do it, and runs away to serve as maid in the brewer's family. Without knowing who is who, she and the chauffeur fall in love. We have given but the briefest sketch of this picture's story. Its value comes from the unstrained humor of its situation and from the acting. Mr. Ober, as the lawyer, makes his part a distinct and lovable character. Mr. James Young, as the duke, is remarkable true to a type. Clara Kimball Young is charming in the role of the romantic girl and acts very naturally. Flora Finck, perhaps a bit too aristocratic in appearance for her part, furnishes the best part of the comedy. Mr. Costello's playing in romantic roles has won him the widest kind of reputation; he is perfect. Surely this picture, well photographed as it is and with only one or two minor weaknesses, is a popular feature, one good for Saturday night.

"DARKFEATHER'S STRATEGY" (Selig), April 8. A story very much indeed like the wholly Indian pictures that the Bison people were releasing last spring. This picture is a little slow; but has some very fine scenes taken in a snow-choked forest in the hills. Darkfeather, the heroine, is a chief's daughter and her father has chosen the wrong brave for her husband. The right brave doesn't tamely submit and is condemned to be burnt; but Darkfeather rescues him. The photographs are only fair; the story is not wholly new.

"THE SPANISH CAVALIER" (Edison), April 9.—A melodramatic picture suggested by the well-known ballad. The cavalier goes away to the Spanish wars and the girl is true. She will not give her love, even to a powerful lord, and gets into dire trouble; is held by the Inquisition as a witch. Her lover is warned by the monk who married them and returns to rescue his love. The backgrounds are fairly suggestive of Spain in the Middle Ages, and the costumes also pass as appropriate. The action pleases as that of a fairy tale might. It lacks finesse in its composition; but is pretty well acted. The audience followed it closely. The camera work is well done.

"AT SCROGGINSES CORNER" (Vitagraph), April 9.—This is distinctly Bunny's picture and he plays in it a delightful part—the very human storekeeper. The story is an emotional, homely melodrama, and the storekeeper's role is in kind much like that of Denman Thompson, as Josh Wittcome in "The Old Homestead." John Bunny plays it very effectively, giving much humor to it; but putting over its emotional, pathetic moments with power. There was one time when some one in the audience sobbed.

The story is old fashioned. The storekeeper's foster daughter, whom he had brought up and loved deeply, was enticed away to the city by the drummer. She thought she could go on the stage and make money to help her old foster father, who had endorsed a protested note. The old man's bitter sorrow is very truthfully shown. He keeps a light in his window for her and, in time, she comes back unharmed.

Mr. Bunny is fairly well supported. Miss Edith Halleran plays Alice, the girl; Mr. Delaney plays the drummer. It is a feature; but it is not critic proof, especially in small things. One scene, a hotel in the city, is poor. The camera work is good.

"IS HE ELIGIBLE?" (Edison), April 10.—A comedy with characters so delightfully burlesqued that they seem real types. It gives us a little incident, the love affair of a young man who was really very eligible. The girl and her parents were very snobbish. To investigate him, they employ a private detective agency, which puts a very pleasing young lady on the job. She becomes the man's stenographer and, in an amusing climax, his wife. The first girl and her parents are drawn so skillfully that our sympathies are kept well on the other, the right side of the picture. These snobs greatly amused a large audience. The acting and camera work will please and the picture is likely to be popular. It is almost a feature.

"A LEAP YEAR ELOPEMENT" (Kalem), April 10.—A very commendable farce comedy that made a large audience laugh very heartily. It shows a courtship in which the very young man, who has been coddled by his parents, is timid, but he isn't a sissy. He is human and likable. It is the girl who arranges the elopement. It is the man's father who follows. The couple get an ice-boat; the father an auto on runners and the race across the frozen lake is speedy. The photographs are very good. It is the best farce comedy dealing with this situation that we have ever seen. The players keep the spectators in sympathy with them. It is a very good picture to show.

"THE TORN NOTE" (Pathe), April 10.—This situation has been handled several times. Perhaps it impresses us as much in this instance as in any we have seen; but it is not a vital situation, nor, judging from the reception it received from a small Broadway audience, is it a very popular one. The note that got torn was from the usual brother in distress, innocently fleeing from the police, and needing money. The sister's husband reads only the first part of the note and, in the usual way, misunderstands. The climax of the picture, with its happy ending, is fresher. The players were competent and the photographs good. It is a fair filler.

"HIS FATHER'S SON" (Vitagraph), April 10.—A picture telling a melodramatic story in which two interesting characters figure, a father, played by Phillips, and a son, played by Williams. The story is clear and, as told, will probably convince spectators who know nothing about Wall Street. The two chief characters are pretty well acted and will probably convince those who do know the street, at least, as types of men. The father is one of those successful men, so conceited that only his own ideas go. No one else knows anything. He exasperates his son. The son goes into business for himself and, in a time of panic, brings his father by speculating against him to the verge of ruin. There's a mother and also a sweetheart in the picture. These bring about a reconciliation. The picture isn't very vital in its presentation of life, and it has one or two scenes that are not strong; but it is fairly interesting. The audience didn't applaud. The camera work is all right.

"WANTED—A WIFE" (Melies), April 17.—A farce comedy that gets over enough to make many hearty laughs. It seemed to please a good sized audience very much. The same situation was treated a few weeks ago by an Independent maker, if we remember; but this is a more good natured and more truly romantic picture, and we enjoyed seeing it again. It doesn't drag and has nothing coarse in it, although the cowboy is, almost excusably, rough for just one moment.

The cowboy is lonesome and advertises in the matrimonial column. The right kind of a girl comes forward; but the boys, finding what is up, get the cook at the hotel to claim Tom's love and protection, while they hide the right girl, with the help of the good natured foreman's wife. Tom is disgusted, to put it lightly, and he doesn't mind whether the cook knows it or not. The final meeting between Tom and the right girl is one on the jokes. The photographs merely serve; they are not artistic.

"ALL IN THE FAMILY" (Essanay), April 11.—A rather conventional situation furnishes this comedy drama, which is pretty well played. It gets over by scenes, however, rather than as a whole; there are laughs in it, but there is not very much sustained humor, the kind of suspense that keeps us expecting a truly good laugh, which is to be furnished in some unexpected way. It is a little homely story, often told before; but with some freshness in its present arrangement. There is nothing at all coarse or unwholesome in it. The photographs are fair.

"THE REDEMPTION OF GREEK JOE" (Selig), April 11.—A mine explosion story, that has one big thrill and some smaller ones. It also has humanity and is well acted; but it might easily have been made more clear cut, vivid, by attention to little things in the scenario. To begin, we didn't know Joe was a chemist till the time came for him to show that he was, and then we couldn't help suspecting that he had been changed into one to fit the needs of the plot. There also were two or three unnecessary scenes that dragged. Poor photography kept several scenes from being truly alive. The mine explosion scene, although dim like most of the others, was the better on that account. The story is wholesome and instructive.

"THEIR FIRST KIDNAPPING CASE" (Biograph), April 11.—A detective burlesque, showing us the two Biograph sleuths on another case. The quality of these farces is well known; this is like the others. It is well photographed and has a little mountain scenery.

"HELP HELP!" (Biograph), April 11.—This slight farce comedy on the same reel, shows us a needless burglar scare, and a great how-do-you-do because a little white poodle shook a curtain and frightened a nervous woman. It has a comic race home of the husband in his automobile, which keeps blowing up in big puffs of white smoke. The suspense is pretty well maintained by the acting of the player who takes the nervous woman's role. There are laughs in it, and it got over much better than the former. It also is well photographed.

"HOW THEY LOST OUT" (Cines), April 16.—A farce comedy freshly acted and amusing, but in outline quite old, it being a variation on the "Cinderella" story. It has the three well dressed girls upstairs, the poor but charming cousin working in the kitchen and the rich, distant relative who comes on a visit and then, seeing how things stand, tells them that he has lost his money. The photographs are good. It makes very fair entertainment.

"UNDER MEXICAN SKIES" (Essanay), April 13.—A picture of life in the rough West that has in large measure the elements that are popular, viz.: an unconventional courtship; the dash of men on horseback; the saving of a girl from a brutal, sneaking scoundrel. All these are very well acted and, in the atmosphere of the picture, quite convincing. The picture is restrained; there is nothing offensive in it. The photographs are good. We think it will make a fair feature.

"THE ANONYMOUS LETTER" (C. G. P. C.), April 16.—The anonymous letter said: "Your wife has an appointment to-night. Watch!" It was signed, "A Friend," and was received by a young husband. The wife referred to had a sister staying with her who also learned of this appointment. She saved the young wife and what followed made an interesting and dramatic picture. The acting is in the French conventional pantomime and seems at time stilted, although the players have plainly put much intelligence into their work.

"ALBERTOS" (C. G. P. C.), April 16.—This acrobatic troupe, consisting of a man and three graceful women, gives a high class exhibition. The picture is very good and entertaining.

"THE PIPE" (Vitagraph), April 15.—A pleasing and well acted comedy picture, in which Mr. Marshall Wilder plays the role of a sensible private detective. The private detective is called in by a young and inexperienced newlywed wife. Her husband had promised not to smoke; but, being tempted by the gift of a pipe, hid it and managed to create a great mystery, one that needed a detective. There is very little burlesque, it being straight comedy; but the situation is not powerfully convincing. The photographs are good. We call it a feature; it isn't so good as some other Vitagraph pictures.

"THE CLUE" (Essanay), April 16.—A picture that is very clearly out of the beaten track, at least in the unexpected way the denouement is brought about. The clue and its explanation are kept till the very last of the film. The mind is so eager to know what final direction the story is to take that, although pretty well acted, it seems delayed. It seemed to be eagerly watched by a large audience. It is well photographed and we risk calling it a feature.

"THAT CHICKEN DINNER" (Lubin), April 11.—One tramp got the fowl and his pals foraged for the trimmings; they got celery, wine, everything but olives. The chicken was baked in mud, tramp cooking, and this is a bit of instructive business. Then the constable and three farm hands came upon them and it was they who feasted. It is very well photographed, but didn't seem to amuse greatly.

"HIS LITTLE SISTER" (Lubin), April 11.—A Western farce on the same reel; it made a good many more laughs than the other. The boys had seen little sister's photograph taken years before, and expected her to look like it. She disappointed them; her face, especially her nose, spoilt business at the restaurant for cowboys, her brother kept. The boys got a horsethief and made him marry her. He asked them to go on with the hanging.

"WINNIE'S DANCE" (Edison), April 13.—A very enjoyable picture indeed. It is romantic and very human and there is an unstrained humor in it that makes the merriest of laughter. It is one of the "Winsome Winnie" series, written by Carolyne Wells, and Winnie's smile is as bewitching as ever. Even her photograph smiles as her fiance holds it up, which is a very pleasing conceit. The players, especially Winnie, are attractive in themselves and their playing is very natural. The photography is perfect. The picture was received with very evident appreciation by a good sized audience. It is a fair feature.

"CAPTAIN JENKS' DIPLOMACY" (Vitagraph), April 13.—Another delightful picture, with Bunny in the chief role as a conciliator. Captain Jenks is a retired sea captain, and when the son of an old friend of his marries against his parents' will, a nice girl, he uses his knowledge of human nature to make the father relent. The picture is well composed, clear and effective. It is humorous; but its humanity also is good. Miss Zena Kiefe's work we have noticed before. She gives some very pleasing moments to this picture in her role as sweetheart, young wife and mother. Mr. Morrison is the young husband and does excellently. The photographs are very good. It is a safe feature picture.

"THE STORY OF A COCOANUT" (Selig), April 12.—Well photographed views of a tropic island near the beach where the cocoanuts grow. It is a fine picture.

"WHEN THE HEART RULES" (Selig), April 12.—A story of an artist who decided to stick to his art and who refused a partnership in his father's business. The old gentleman was very much provoked and cast off the son. Five years later they are brought together again. The players are in themselves pleasing, but the picture fails to convince. The photographs are in many of the scenes rather dim.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY" (No. 16), April 15.—This is a remarkably interesting number. There are, among many items of much interest, three that will attract attention. A derelict, half-sunken schooner is destroyed by the men from a U. S. gunboat. It was a menace to navigation and it had to be blown up. Also the picture of a French corporal being disgraced and degraded before his comrades. He had been convicted of selling military secrets to the Germans. He is marched out before the paraded regiment; every bit of color, gold buttons or lace is contemptuously cut from his clothes and he is then marched back, sentenced to twenty years at hard labor. The third very interesting item is the Hillsville, Va., courthouse, recently shot up during a trial. We are shown Sidna Allen's home; the prison; some of the outlaw feudists who have been captured, etc.

"THE FEMALE OF THE SPECIES" (Biograph), April 15.—A picture giving us a remarkable psychological study. It is very effectively and vividly presented and will probably cause a good deal of discussion. It is acted for the most part by three players, and these roles are taken by the three best known ladies of the Biograph Company. The background is the desert and we are given remarkable views of it, with its cutting sand dust, its strange growths, cactus and the like, and its deadly thirst. The action that the picture shows transpires while these three women are crossing the desert toward civilization. Its object, very roughly speaking, is to bring out dramatically two or three considerations that strongly affect the female of the species in her attitude toward life. The picture is clean handed, artistically strong and unusually interesting. The photographs are excellent. We call it a feature and think it would serve as such almost anywhere.

"IN AFTER YEARS" (Lubin), April 15.—Mr. Arthur Johnson, with Miss Lottie Brisco, plays in this melodramatic picture, a man whose daughter was strangely separated from him when a very little girl; was cared for and brought up by strangers and meets him again in the end. She is identified by the little hat and coat she had worn the day she climbed into a strange automobile and hid. The story does not convince strongly. It is pretty well acted and perfectly photographed.

"WAR'S HAVOC" (Kalem), April 15.—A wartime picture, taken around a grand old Southern home. It is a highly commendable offering. The story is exciting. There are pretty girls, handsome officers and large bodies of troops that seem well trained, and that are used effectively in more than one impressive scene. The backgrounds, include a railroad with trains of cars and old fashioned engines. Best of all there is a head-on collision between a train and a single engine that made one or two in the audience cry out almost in fear. It is well photographed and is a sure feature.

"UNWELCOME LOVE" (Pathe), April 13.—An extremely melodramatic story played very well by good actors. Miss Gwendolin Pate, as the heroine of it, is especially commendable. She plays her role charmingly. But hardly less so is the young lady who takes the villainess's part. Both are very good looking and the average spectator will find in their acting much more agreeable entertainment than their roles, less fortunately filled, could possibly have given. The story is not strong. There are two extremely well managed accidents which are thrills. In the first Miss Pate skillfully falls down a shaft; in the second the other lady is saved from being crushed by a boiler. The whole cast does very well indeed. The photographs are good.

"MADAME ROLAND" (Cines), April 13.—This glorious, historical picture has been noticed already in this paper. We may add that it held the audience that saw it with power. It is a very sure Saturday night feature film, one of the best constructed historical pictures that we remember. It will be likely to please any audience, the most critical and the most careless alike. In front of us, about twenty boys of seventeen and eighteen, gave it the closest attention.

"BECKY GETS A HUSBAND" (Lubin), April 13.—A picture of a wedding in which the groom is Irish and the bride Yiddish. They had to call the police and the police called on the fire department. The hose broke up the scrap. There is true humor in it of a very enjoyable kind and some rough business also. It is well acted and well photographed and plainly tickled a large audience.

"THE ALLIGATOR FARM" (Lubin), April 13.—On the same reel, this is a clearly photographed and instructive picture. There is a bit of good fun here also. The little curly-headed player of the Lubin Company in the West did not like to stand too close to the alligator pool.

"CALIFORNIA OSTRICH AND PIGEON FARM" (Lubin), April 13.—Instructive and well photographed.

Independent.

"THOSE EYES" (Great Northern), April .—The eyes were in a painting. The thief couldn't work in the room with them staring at him, so he cut them out of the portrait. He heard people coming and hid behind the picture and looked out through the eye-holes. A very novel effect is produced; but it certainly gets over. The burglar comes from the hiding-place and the telephone is very celeverly utilized by the producer to effect a thrilling climax. The picture is well acted. From the exhibitors' viewpoint, it will prove a very valuable feature.

"DRIVEN FROM THE RANCH" (Gaumont), April 21.—A Western picture full of fresh atmosphere. The picture was taken in France, but for vim and dash and red-hot sensations entirely new, it can give pointers to the best of home make. There are no Indians. It shows a bad man chased and captured by a sheriff with a posse. From the exhibitors' viewpoint, it is a feature thriller of the very best kind. The photographs are fine. The scenes have at times an art quality of a high order and at the same time a thrilling quality that is remarkable. The photography is good. We give it high commendation only because we think it will please all kinds of audiences.

"REVENGE IS BLIND" (Great Northern), April 20.—The poacher poisons fruit, hoping that the owner of the estate or one of his family will be killed. His own daughter is a seamstress for the family and it is she who gets the poison. The poacher finds her dying and has to confess in order to have the antidote applied. The photographs are so so; the acting is good.

"THE DISTANT RELATIVE" (American), April 15.—This distant relative is a scheming woman who installs herself as the guardian of the two orphans, girls, and then tries to gain possession of their ranch. The girls have two friends among the cowboys who circumvent the schemer and her accomplice. There are some beautiful natural scenes. The picture does not convince human emotions deeply. Its interest lives only while the outcome is in doubt. The situation is fresh, however; it being too difficult to attract hack writers. It deserves convincing treatment; it has never received it yet, and it won't be easy to compose the right scenario for it. The photographs are good, but somewhat hard.

"A PAIR OF BABY'S SHOES" (Nestor), April 15.—In this picture a pair of baby's shoes keeps a married couple from a final separation. They had quarreled. The old butler puts one shoe, that had been worn by the only child, now dead, of this couple, in the grip of husband and the other in that of the wife. Just before the final parting these are found. The picture does not convince enough to make it deeply effective. The photographs are very good.

"LOS ANARQUISTES" (Republic), April 16.—A sensational story of some European republic, in which an anarchistic plot to kill a president is utilized as the background of a love story, in which the chief of the secret service and the abused wife of the anarquist figure in the principal roles. The detective, in disguise, uncovers the plot and takes steps to frustrate it. In the end the anarchist is killed and the detective marries the woman. The picture has the qualities of the usual picture of this kind; it is neither emotional nor convincing, but furnishes a feeling of suspense. The story is fairly well woven and the figures are distinctly drawn.

"A SON'S INGRATITUDE" (Eclair), April 16.—King Lear gave his fortune away to daughters; in this film the father gives his to a son. A panic on the exchange strips him of all he has left and he appeals in vain to his son for financial aid to help him tide over the difficulty. Penniless, he feels the gnaw of hunger and his son, in the midst of luxury, will not help him. But remorse haunts the son for his hardness, and he takes his father in in time to ease his last moments, so it seems; but the old man recovers and, in contrition, the son returns all the money his father had given him. The situation convinces our feeling, while our experience denies its probability. The producer has understood this weakness and very carefully provided against it. The acting is very good; the story is clear and smooth; the photography is clear and full of atmosphere. We fear to call it a strong feature; it is nearly one, and it surely is a desirable filler.

"HER LORD AND MASTER?" (Powers), April 16.—A matrimonial farce, opening with a kitchen scene, in which we see that the husband and man of the home wears an apron and is not permitted to smoke in the home. He goes to a picture show and sees a film that deals with his own case. It suggests revolt to him; but his case is sad; his old woman gives him a drubbing and kicks him out of the house. The photographs are good. It will amuse the average audience very much.

"WHAT'S THE USE?" (Powers), April 16.—A courtship comedy that most audiences will find quite laughable. It is slight; but doesn't drag. The photography is good.

"HER INDIAN HERO" (Nestor), April 17.—Miss Dorothy Davenport plays, in this picture, a society girl who visits an Indian village with friends, and flirts with a young chief, played by Mr. Gebbart. This chief's head is turned and he falls in love. She foolishly encourages him. He follows her to the city and calls, in war feathers, he a Carlisle Indian. This was audacious in the producer; it was, we at first thought, commendably subtle, but as it turned out, the picture needed it; it was to have a savage struggle (primitive man fashion, a present day fad) between the Indian and the girl's fiance, played by Jack Conway. The picture is interesting, it is well acted, doesn't drag and presents the sharpest kind of contrasts. The struggle,and what followed, doesn't convince. The photographs are good. The film is likely to be popular.

"THE FATE OF MOTHERS" (Gaumont), April 21.—A two-reel subject, it tells a love story in which are shown the sacrifices that mothers are continually making for children who are ungrateful almost of necessity, for they do not understand. The situation is pictured with remarkable vividness. The mother is a widow. There are two love stories, the mother's and the daughter's. The widow gave up her own heart's desire because her daughter didn't want her to get married, only to be coldly, rudely treated by her son-in-law. She had a hard time; but, nevertheless, is requested by her daughter once again to sacrifice herself of every cent to pay the debts of her son-in-law. This is the story in outline; but the picture is much more. It is acted with much simplicity and power. It is a picture that no just criticism can find much fault with. It is, however, a picture of French life and the average American spectator may not understand all the truth of it. It will not excite but interest. It is the kind of picture that people called "high brows" are all the time demanding. It is dignified.

"THE LOVE TRAIL" (Nestor), April 20.—A beautiful, mountainous ranch country serves as background for this triple love story picture, in which Mr. Conway and Mr. Gebbart play the leads. They are college chums. The mother of one, a widow, has planned a match between her son and the daughter of a neighbor. She also wants her daughter to marry his college chum. These four young people have a hard time accepting each other. It is they, however, who make a match between the widow and widower. The picture isn't convincing, but it doesn't drag, and the out-of-doors' scenes are good. We dare not call it a feature, but it has a comedy atmosphere and will be liked.

"INTO THE DESERT" (Thanhouser), April 19.—A picture that is remarkable because of its doesert atmosphere which is very realistically suggested, both as to desert palms, in the oasis, and sand. The story tells of an American heroine who was lured out into the desert by a native Arab guide and captured by a band of wild Bedouins, whose chief held her for ransom. This, the American lover brings; but the chief desires both it and the girl. The Arab's wife, because of jealousy, saves her, giving her a horse, on which both she and the American lover escape. The acting is very fair and the photographs are good. It will serve as a feature, but perhaps not one for Saturday night.

"THE BABY BRIDE" (Thanhouser), April 16.—Where pictures of children are popular, this ought to be a good feature. Little Marie Eline plays the chief role in it, as a small boy who took a great shine to the little girl, still younger, next door. The two are as cute as can be. They run away to get married. This brought about a love match between the little boy's very pretty mother, a widow, and the little girl's guardian. It is a light but bright and pleasing comedy story, and the audience seemed to find in it much entertainment. It is well photographed and will make a good feature for the right audience.

"THE TRAMP AND THE BARREL" (Ambrosio), April 17.—A rush and tumble farce with novel and amusing incidents. The tramp is chased first by one man and then by quite a few. He is cornered in a barrel; its head is nailed on; and it is rolled down steps, with a dummy inside. It is like other trick farces that we have seen, pretty well made and photographed.

"A DAY OF HASTE" (Ambrosio), April 17.—On the same reel, this also is a farce with trick photography. It doesn't concern itself with one story, but gives a series of sketches. Perhaps it's an Italian scenario writer's idea of what Turin would be like, if it were Chicago. It is amusing and, if it isn't a scream, neither is it wearisome. The split reel will lighten a program and will probably come in handy.

"BABY'S ADVENTURES" (Champion), April 15.—A farce comedy. The baby, asleep in a clothes basket, is accidentally covered with soiled clothes and started on its way to the laundry. The chase to save it by the kid's father and its nurse and the suspense incident to this is very well managed. The poor kid is saved from the clothes boiler only to go a bit later over a cliff. The picture has thrills of the most thrilling kind; is pretty well photographed and is a good safe picture to show. No one will claim that it's slow.

"AN EMBARRASSING PURCHASE" (Lux), April 19.—Bill is not very well and the doctor prescribes exercise and cold baths. Bill buys a tub and takes it home. It is so big that he can't see where he is going, and so awkward that he can't go straight, even where he can see. This gives him a chance to break things and get the crowd after him. Bill always has some new wrinkles to give us, and there are in the picture several good laughs. It makes a fair filler and a good film to lighten a program.

"CHING-CHANG IN PARIS" (Lux), April 19.—The family is away from the city house and the servants rent, for fun, one of the rooms to a Chinaman. The family come home and chase him out. The fun comes from the speed with which the movements are shown. It is very slight, on the same reel with the Bill picture.

"BILLY THE DETECTIVE" (Solax), April 19.—Billy had one of those "How To Become" books in his pocket and was ambitious to shine as a great sleuth. He found a notebook that made him suspect that a murder was about to be committed. He had adventures; but failed to bring the police in time to prevent the killing of "Edward," the family roaster. The quality of this farce comes from its briskness; it isn't permitted to drag. The camera work is good.

"WOMAN ALWAYS PAYS" (Imp), April 18.—A big, two-reel feature picture, naturally acted, with Miss Asta Nielson in the leading role. She is well supported by a large cast. The story is perfectly clear and smooth, demanding no strain on the spectator's attention. It is extremely well photographed, and shows most delightful backgrounds, glimpses of street life in Copenhagen, and glimpses of a village street, with an old church tower, in rural Denmark; also other scenes, among them a wayside beer garden under a grove of pines.

The story is sensational and ends very dramatically in a tense climax. It deals with passion in a clean handed, honest way. It opens with a meeting of a young man and woman, shows a glimpse of the courtship and carries us on through a married life without love, to the coming of the man, a circus performer, who excites passion in the wife. The rest of the picture shows a good deal of her sensational experiences with this man. Twice her husband tries in vain to recall her. Their last meeting comes by chance in the piney beer garden and results in a sensational struggle, in which the woman kills her paramour and is led away by the police.

"ANIMATED WEEKLY No. 5" (M. P. Distributing & Sales Co.), April 10.—People are hearing much about the devastation caused by floods in the Middle West. The Weekly offers, and we think it the most pertinent item this week, an excellent general survey of the city of Memphis, Tenn. It seems pretty well under water. This is very interesting. Another item of interest shows the Easter crowds on Fifth Avenue, New York, and on the boardwalk, Atlantic City, N. J. Another item shows the effects of a hurricane at Camden, N. J., which were most remarkable. It demolished brick buildings. Among the items of only general interest is one showing the maneuvers of French troops as seen from an airship; another of the "Queen of Queens," a working girl of Paris, chosen for popularity and crowned as the city's beauty. We also have the funeral of Senator "Fiddling Bob" Taylor; the ruin of Young's Pier, Atlantic City; an Easter egg hunt at Williamsport, Pa.; a picture of New York's popular gubernatorial possibility, Sulzer; a view of some new Paris dresses; a strange burial procession of a monk, which recently took place in Naples, and a view of Houdini, which latter can hardly be called news. This week's number seems to fall below the former numbers.

NO DIFFERENCE.—San Francisco, Cal., writes: "Some time ago, I wrote you, saying I had much trouble with condensers breaking. Recently, however, we installed an Edison Transformer, and since that time have not broken a lens. Is there any scientific explanation for this? I formerly used rheostats. Am using about the same amount of current at the arc; that is to say 40 to 60 amperes. Not long ago, I changed a two pin Edison into a fine flickerless machine, by taking out one of the pins, and letting the shutter go around twice to each picture. I left the flicker blade on the shutter, and as it passes the lens twice to each picture, and the main blade passes once as a flicker blade, there is no flicker left. Of course I had to change the gearing, but I got as steady a picture as can be made, and am passing the good word along."

I should say you would cut a very large percentage of the light by such a scheme as that. It also seems to me you would have to increase the width of the shutter blade considerably. I cannot see how the plan, as you have outlined it, could possibly work at all. As to the condenser breakage, I know of no reason in the world why the change from rheostat to transformer should eliminate it, provided of course, the same number of amperes be used at the arc. However, as you have said, condenser breakage is a queer thing, and there are a great many things in connection therewith which seemingly pass understanding.

BIG NOISE.—Rhode Island (name of town suppressed by request), writes: "We are using two Powers No. 5 machines. Have a 14-foot picture at 43 feet. Using 45 amperes of 110 volt A. C. Kindly reply to the following: (1) Have only fair light. It is by no means bright. We are now using one 6½ and one 7½ condenser, have tried two 7½s and two 6½s without results. Have moved the lamphouse back and forth, but we always have a ghost. (2) What is the cause of the big noise in the lamphouse? (3) Our pictures flicker something terrible (since about three weeks); they flicker at any speed, slow or fast, but they do not jump. Kindly let me know what the trouble is, and how we may remove it."

(1) You cannot expect a very brilliant light, from 45 amperes A. C., on a 14-foot picture. However, the light should nevertheless be very good, and quite satisfactory. Possibly you have been used to D. C., in which case you would naturally be somewhat disappointed with A. C. results. Very likely the ghost is due to the set of your carbon, the same being the shadow of your lower carbon tip. We would advise you to send in $1.50 for a Handbook. On pages 86 to 91 inclusive, you will find the matter of carbon setting, and its results, explained. On page 88, you will find the various sets, and their results, illustrated. This alone should be worth to you the price of the book. (2) I presume the reason for the "big noise" lies in the fact that you are using a transformer (economizer, compensarc, inductor, etc.) and it has caused a heavy vibration in your carbons. If this is the fact, and the noise is sufficient to be seriously objectionable, I would report the matter to the maker of the transformer and demand that it be remedied. (3) You say your pictures flicker something terrible, and then add, in parenthesis, "since about three weeks;" now if you mean that your pictures began to flicker about three weeks ago and that you have made no change, either in the screen or in the machine, then I will have to pass the matter up. I do not know what is wrong. Possibly, however, what you term a "flicker" is in reality a travel-ghost, due to your shutter being out of time. Remedy is, of course, to set the shutter. This, however, seems hardly probable since you have two machines, and it is not likely both would develop the same fault at one and the same time. Possibly you have installed an aluminum screen, or something of that kind, which would account for the flicker trouble, since the flicker is much worse on a reflecting or semi-reflecting screen, than it is on an ordinary cloth screen. I think this is about all the assistance I can give you without having more definite information.

CARBON SOAKING.—Fort Worth, Tex., writes: "The formula I gave you (page 45, April 6th issue) was just enough to try six 6-inch carbons. They should be of a brand which has uniform hardness. Bichromate of soda is what I meant—not bicarbonate. I usually soak twenty-five 6-inch carbons, and this is the amount of mixture necessary; 4 ounces bichromate of soda and 1¼ pints of boiling water, mixed and allowed to cool. Then, while slowly stirring, add little by little 3 ounces or sulphuric acid, not diluted. Caution: never pour water into the acid, but instead add the acid little by little to the mixture. Bichromate of soda has about 70 per cent. oxygen, which will turn the hydrogen into water, thus forming chromate of soda. Every one knows what oxygen has to do with light. I made this discovery while working on the road through Jersey, at a small town called Lodi, two or three miles out from Passaic. I then gave it a thorough tryout at the Barnes Chemical Works, Paterson, N. J. There is positively no danger except with the acid. And you will find thousands of men using that in the plants in and around Paterson, N. J. Use it as directed and there is no danger. We have started a union, under the I. B. E. W. The following are the officers: J. Turnpaugh, president; J. H. Smith, vice president; Thos. G. Cottar, financial secretary; Ernest Royer, recording secretary; and J. Austin, treasurer."

I, of course, know nothing whatever concerning the value of this receipt; however, using due caution in the handling of the acid, our correspondents might try it out and report. If there is any value in the carbon soaking stunt, we want to know it. The soaking of carbons costs very little, and if better results can be obtained by doing it, then it should be done. My attention was strongly attracted by what I saw in Brother Gregory's operating room at Baltimore. When a man can fool me to the extent that I suppose I am looking at D. C. light on the screen, when in reality it is A. C., I am willing to concede that he is "going some" in the matter of light. And that is exactly what Brother Gregory did. And that is why I was thoroughly satisfied that there was something in his carbon soaking proposition. There is, regardless of brilliancy, a harshness to A. C. curtain illumination. The experienced man can usually tell at a glance whether the light on the screen is from A. C. or D. C. The carbon soaking as done by friend Gregory, removed this harshness, and gave the sof mellow D. C. illumination. That is the explanation of my interest in the various carbon soaking formulas.

MOTOR DRIVE.—Findlay, Ohio, writes: "Enclosed find photos which hope are self explanatory. They show a "Powers Six" hooked up to Kimble ⅛ h.p. variable speed motor. After experimenting with vari motor drives, I find this to be superior to any I have tried. It runs steady as a clock. It has been in service for over three months, runr an average of eight hours a day, and seven days a week. It has never gi one minute's trouble. It needs but very little attention. As this is first letter to the department, I feel I should not take up too much s in a paper as valuable as THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD."

The motor drive scheme looks very good indeed, and we thanl submitting the same. While the regular motor drive attachm probably be still a little better, yet the scheme you have adopted ing the drive pulley to the lower sprocket shaft is far superio from the flywheel. As I have repeatedly said, belting from the a very bad scheme—very bad indeed. You need have no fea up too much space, as long as you have interesting matter Space is valuable—that is quite true. We could fill a dozen week, and perhaps even more. This, however, need not d from sending in matter. It is for the editor to decide whi letter, and what particular parts of letters will do the great good to all concerned. That is what we are here for, and our space in accordance with that idea.

SPOT LIGHT.—Seattle, Wash., writes: "Will you kindly tion as to the spot light; its use, action, and how differ obtained?"

The spot light is nothing more or less than a round spot similar to the spot at the cooling plate of the projection m much larger of course, projected to the stage or curtain b arc lamp, the same as is used with the moving picture single plano-convex lens, the same as a condenser lens, e usually of larger diameter, though it is possible to use a in diameter. I might modify this, however, by saying th throws two lenses are sometimes used, one being a 6 plano-convex, and the other a 4½-inch (diameter) plano-c next the screen, and separated from the large lens by sev spot is made smaller or larger by altering the distance

the liberty of publishing your name, friend Day, since I d have the credit for the ideas advanced. Your letter is in- ing. That half inch carbon below stunt sounds reasonable, ld suppose the lower carbon would burn so much faster at there would not be sufficient up and down adjust- take care of the difference when a slow thousand foot eavy amperage. As to the loop steadier, I have seen hemes tried, but never observed any material improve- se. Yes, that copper strip would undoubtedly keep the all right; but I would not advise its use, except in since there would be a very large likelihood of of the film. Its edges also should be flared back of an inch at least. A SUGGESTION.—Brownsville, Tex., writes: "I notice that a good many operators seem to dislike the idea of installing isolated light plants of less than 110 volt pressure, for the reason that most of the apparatus is designed for 110 volt or 220 volt current. Suppose they use two dynamos, driven by the same engine; one being wound for 110 volt, for the incandescent lights, fans, motors, etc., and a small 60 volt generator to be used for the arc, or arcs, only. A high class 6 h. p. throttling governor engine, being designed to operate a 3.5 k.w. dynamo, ought to run a 1.5 k.w. generator of 110 volt, and one of 2 k.w. 60 volt = 33⅓ amperes, for the moving picture arc. Of course as generators are never 100 per cent. efficient there would be an extra loss in the second one, and, considering the extra cost of investment, probably very little if anything would be gained by it; but for convenience sake, and where an operator wants to be able to switch on to city current in case of a sudden breakdown of his plant, which may happen even to those who can see a breakdown one week in advance, and where a bigger dynamo and a number of arcs are concerned, it seems to be the ideal way. I am merely advancing an idea which I have not yet tried out myself, but which I believe would work out."

It strikes me, Brownsville, it would be cheaper to install a double system of wiring, so that one could switch over from the 60 volt house to the 110 volt city mains. This, of course, would involve two complete separate systems of incandescent wiring; but that would not be so very expensive in the ordinary house after all. The 110 volt current would only be used in case of emergency, and the wiring need only be sufficient to give a minimum of house illumination when using that system. The installation of a separate dynamo for incandescent light, together with its cost of up-keep, would, I believe, far more than overbalance the cost of installing two systems of wiring; and I think the latter would be the better way. We thank you, however, for submitting the idea. While we cannot always agree with the various things submitted, still the publication of different ideas of different men has a distinct value, even though the thought in itself may not have immediate practical value.

CINES PERFORATIONS.—The editor has had several complaints concerning the Cines film. This week a typical kick comes in from a New York operator. He says one of his machines ran the Cines films all right, and the other one would hardly run them at all. I have secured samples of Cines films, and I find the trouble to lie in the fact that the distance is too great between the inner edges of the two rows of sprocket holes. The distance is exactly one inch. Theoretically, this is correct; practically, however, it is not correct. Films having a distance of one inch between the inner edges of the two rows of sprocket holes will run all right on some sprockets. There is, however, no matter how careful the manufacturer may be, some variation in sprockets. It is a mechanical impossibility to get them all exactly the same. I would most certainly recommend to the Cines people, of which company George Kleine, of Chicago, is the American representative, that they change their perforators, and stand not on the order of their doing it. The rows of sprocket holes should be one and one hundred and ten one thousandths of an inch from center to center. I might say that there is also a very large need for a standard size of perforation. Perforation varies in size, shape, and distance between the rows. There is absolutely no excuse whatever for this. It should not be. Even the perforations of the various Licensed manufactures vary in all these particulars. Going even further than this, I recently examined three samples of Pathe film and found the perforation of each one of them to be different. If somebody will explain to me the philosophy of this kind of business, I would like to have it done. It is bad from any and every point of view. The machine manufacturer uses a sprocket with teeth of standard size. The film manufacturers certainly ought to come together and adopt as a standard the sprocket hole which will work best on these sprockets. As the matter now lies, each manufacturer seems to proceed according to his own individual idea, and some manufacturers even seem to have two or three sets of ideas concerning the same thing.

IDEAS RATHER HAZY.—Oklahoma (name of town suppressed) orders a handbook and writes: "We will in the near future enlarge our present theater. The throw will be from 85 to 100 feet, as against 65 at present. Some time ago I gave my curtain a very slight tint of green. It now requires a very thick condenser to project a clear picture at 65 feet. Have had considerable condenser trouble since the pair which gave an almost perfect picture cracked. I ordered six more just like them from the Kleine Optical Company, Chicago, and they sent a smaller condenser (not so thick). Will you kindly advise me what size condenser would best suit our throw, also where Meniscus condensers of all sizes can be obtained? Would also like to know what you think of the Wright condenser cells, advertised in the March 23d issue. What, in your opinion, is the best projection curtain on the market? Can you tell me whether or not aluminum coated screens are an asset to projection and whether or not they are going to be universally adopted? I would like also to have an expression of your opinion as to the future of the phonograph in the motion picture theater; also the piano, when used in front or back for a ballyhoo? There is some discussion in certain circles in one or two cities in this State, and I would like to know just what you think in regard to my last two questions."

As regards condenser lenses, your ideas are not very clear. You speak of the size of the lens. Evidently, however, instead of size, which refers to the diameter of the lens, you refer to the focus of the lens, which has to do with the distance from the lens at which the light rays will be converged to a point. The change of your screen would make no difference in the thickness of the required condenser lens. The thickness of the lens has to do with its focus. The thicker the lens, the shorter its focus will be. A 6½ lens is considerably thinner than is a 7½ lens. The directions for measuring condenser lenses, which you will find on page 67 of the handbook, were as nearly correct as I was able to obtain at that time. The correct method, however, is to measure as shown in the illustration on page 67, of the handbook, and then turn the lens around, with the convex side to the wall, and measure again. A difference will be found in the two measurements, and the correct focal length of the lens, as nearly as it can be obtained by this kind of rough measurement, will be the shorter measurements from the wall to the lens, plus half the difference between the two measurements. Thus: if it measures 6 inches one way, and 7 the other, then the true measurement will be 6½. You have not given me the width of your picture, therefore I cannot tell you what condensers will be suitable to your work. However, unless the picture is quite large, I should say that you ought to have either one 7½, and one 6½, or two 7½ lenses. From what you say, however, I take it you have obtained the best results by the use of two 6½ lenses, and it is results we are after. As to the Meniscus lenses: I do not know what manufacturers, or dealers in this country handle them. I presume, however, that the Kleine Optical Company, Chicago (166 N. State St.) can either supply them, or tell you where they can be had. As to the Wright condenser cell: That company has not seen fit to send me one of their cells for examination and test. I cannot, therefore, give you any information concerning them. Manufacturers should understand that the editor of this department will not recommend any device or appliance which he has not himself personally seen, examined or tested, or concerning which, in lieu thereof, unquestionable evidence has not been produced as to its merits. Manufacturers who send in devices to be examined and reported upon, should address them to the Projection Department of the Moving Picture World. They will be returned to the owner, of course. As to expressing our opinion regarding the relative merits of various screens, that is not the province of this department. I think you will readily understand that it would not be practical for us to make comparisons. All the various patent screens have something to commend them. For good results aluminum curtains must be very carefully prepared. It must not be imagined that good results can be had simply by smearing aluminum on a piece of canvas. Of course the picture will be made brighter than it would be on an ordinary curtain by this means, but there are other things to consider. Light projected on such a curtain has a harsh metallic color, and there is more or less of a glaring, objectionable brilliancy present, which tends, in some cases, to destroy the definition, and in other cases to injure the eyes of the audience. Aluminum curtains made by men who are experts in such work have proven very satisfactory. As to the future of the phonograph in moving pictures, who can say? Personally, in his own house, the writer has fooled an audience night after night. He has had the audience comment on the splendid talent we had procured. Many expressed the wish that I have the singer stand where he or she could be seen. I had a singer, but supplemented his work by a phonograph hidden behind a screen of palm plants, set next the piano. I had the piano player trained to play with the phonograph, and selected my records very carefully. She would start out with a loud prelude just as the phonograph was started. This she continued until the voice came, when she immediately dropped to a soft accompaniment, and the effect was simply great. It requires very careful handling to get away with this. I got away with the thing completely, and kept it up for two or three weeks. We played to practically the same audience night after night, but the joke was too good to keep. Finally one night I set the phonograph where it could be seen, and I made a mistake when I did that. Where this can be done, and it undoubtedly can be, who shall say to what extent the phonograph can be used. But after all that is but a mere bagatelle as compared with what Mr. Edison proposes, and expects to accomplish. On his plans I do not wish at this time to comment, more than this: Mr. Edison assured me personally that inside of a year absolutely perfect grand opera would be given in small towns at 5 cents per opera; this by means of a phonograph joined to moving pictures by thorough and complete synchronism. This seems almost too good to be true. Mr. Edison, however, has already accomplished so many marvelous things, that we are not justified in doubting his present claim. We hope and trust that it will all come true. As to using a piano for a ballyhoo, we may dismiss that proposition by simply saying that we do not believe in ballyhoos. Our kind of a ballyhoo is an A No. 1 first class picture on the screen. That is what will draw the crowd, if it is to be drawn at all. Of course there may be isolated cases where some sort of a ballyhoo might be advisable. but not many.

SLOW METER.—Bend, Ore., writes: "The Electric Company have me connected through a 25 ampere meter. I am using 45 amperes at the arc; also have an electric sign with 37 8cp. and 4 16cp. lamps; also have 11 16cp. lamps, and 4 4w. tungstens. This, of course, overloads the meter. I want to know who is getting the benefit—myself, or the company? I have as good a light as anybody could desire, and have had no trouble getting that amount through a 25 ampere meter. My current is 115 volt A. C."

Unquestionably your meter is very heavily overloaded. If you are really using 45 amperes at the arc, then it is overloaded more than 100 per cent. (assuming it to be, as you say, a 25 ampere meter) and it is rather strange that you have not burned it out. The effect will be to cause the meter to run slow; that is to say, not register the actual amount of power being consumed. You are, therefore, the gainer.

HANDBOOK.—Abilene, Tex., wants to know the price of the handbook. Says he has had five years' experience, and has had trouble like the rest of them, but always gets along somehow.

Price of the handbook is $1.50, postpaid. "Getting along somehow" is all very well, but the expression itself does not impress one favorably. However, I don't think Abilene meant it the way it sounds. The fact that he reads the department and proposes to invest in a handbook, proves him to be one who seeks to learn, and such a one will constantly improve his work. It is the self-satisfied ignoramus (and the self-satisfied one usually is an ignoramus) who is a detriment to the business. The one who seeks knowledge will find it. He may lack something to-day, but to-morrow he will secure it. The self-satisfied one lacks something to-day, and he will probably be lacking the same thing a year from to-day. Now let me call your undivided attention to something, at the risk of seeming to "boost my own game." The price of the Moving Picture World is $3.00 per year. The price of the handbook is $1.50. Within the covers of 52 numbers of the Moving Picture World, and the handbook, all to be secured at a cost of $4.50, is knowledge the average operator needs and cannot possibly secure elsewhere. The knowledge is worth to him ten times $4.50, if he proposes to remain an operator, and follow that business as his permanent profession. He will, or at least a great many of them will, think nothing of "blowing in" $4.50. Usually, too, the money blown in returns him absolutely nothing whatever having any tangible value. It is quite possible, too, that the money thus expended will not only do him no good, but will actually do him harm. Now just stop and think a moment. Ask yourself what opinion you would have of the intelllgence of a man who would spend $4.50 foolishly, and yet hesitate to spend the same sum for something that would be of permanent, lasting benefit to him for years to come. Don't you really think he is a rather short-sighted person after all? Do you think that kind of a man will ever succeed as an operator, or as anything else for that matter? Now, gentlemen, do not imagine I am writing this in order to sell more handbooks, or increase the subscription list of the Moving Picture World. The handbooks are selling at the rate of from eight to ten a day, and the sale has already reached about 6,000. The Moving Picture World reaches practically every moving picture man in this country—and that is not hot air either, but a cold statement of easily proven fact. Every operator should, however, himself, personally, subscribe for the World, and file them away, making an index from week to week of the matter in the department. If he does this, he will in a comparatively short time have the most valuable operator's reference library which he could possibly obtain. I have written all this simply to wake up the man who hesitates to expend a small sum of money for his own improvement and advancement. If he doesn't like to be talked to thus, then let him cease being silly, and seek by every means in his power to obtain every possible bit of knowledge of his profession that he can obtain.

THE GHOST.—Milwaukee, Wis., writes: "Having with profit read your Projection Department, I wish to contribute my mite on how to banish the 'ghost,' which seems to be bothering quite a few. Have laid about a dozen of these unwelcome pests in and near this city, and have yet to meet one that does not 'git' when the right treatment is applied. The shifting of lamphouse, and changing to different focus of condensers is all right as far as it goes. You had a hint in your department quite a while ago, when you described the Simplex machine, as to the cause and cure of 'ghosts.' Every ghost that I have met had its birth and being in the condenser mount, in combination with a comparatively long throw. Not so very long ago the average distance from screen to machine was from 40 to 60 feet, and condenser mounts were made long enough to accommodate 4½, 5½ and 6½ inch focus condensers. We had but little trouble with ghosts with the short distance we had to project pictures. Depth of theaters and distance from machine to screen have increased, however, but we have with us still the long condenser mount that was designed for thick condensers. When we insert thinner (7½, 8½, etc.) condensers to meet the conditions of the longer throw. The space between the condensers is increased, and just here is where Mr. Ghost steps in. The cure—less space between condensers. To those who have a ghost I will suggest the following experiment in proof of what I say: After the last show, do not remove the carbons from your lamp. Leave them just as they are. Next day come down early and remove your front condenser (the one nearest your machine head). Light your lamp without changing its adjustment in any way (position of lamp and back condenser remaining just as when projecting your last reel). You will find that the rays of light, which are now passing through the back condensers only, diverge, or spread. You are in fact throwing what is called a flood light—the diameter of this light increasing with the distance. Now note that all of the rays of light, except that ray that passes directly through the center of the condenser, spread; so that the farther away we move the front condenser from its mate the less illumination will strike its center. It is my belief that this lack of light in the center of the front condenser is what causes the ghost, and the nearer we can get our condensers without their surfaces touching at the center, the more even will the front condenser be illuminated. Result: a clearer field on the screen. Now move your lamps back, away from your condenser, and you will find that the rays of light become more nearly parallel. This explains why it is possible, in some cases, to remove a ghost by moving the lamphouse back. You must then, with both condensing lenses in, move your arc farther away from the condenser. But a real dark purple ghost cannot be removed in this way—only the pale blue, sickly kind will be removed by moving the lamphouse back—and also the lamp. Where both lantern slides and film are projected from the same lamp the E. F. of the condensers is fixed by the E. F. of the stereopticon lens. The M. P. lens and the stereopticon lens should be placed within an inch or so of the same distance from the screen. Under this condition, and with proper E. F. condensers, properly spaced, we get a clear field through both M. P. and stereo lens, without having to shift lamp every time we change from M. P. to slides. Now if to clear up a ghost we move lamp and lamphouse back we must move our stereo lens back also, to maintain the focus on our slides, and if this be carried to extremes we must slide the lamp, in the lamphouse, back and forward every time we change from M. P. to slides. What we need to banish forever this ghost is, first, an adjustable condenser mount, so that condensers can be properly spaced; second, both stereo and M. P. lens, on combination outfits, set the same distance from the screen; third, condensers of the same E. F. as stereo lens. Distance of lamp from M. P. head will then be determined (and correctly) by E. F. of stereo lens.

"Now, Brother Richardson, I may be all wrong in my theory as to the cause of the ghost. If so I want to be corrected. But the cure works every time. Now a request which I hope you will grant. The World and your department have done more to improve our craft than any other agency. You have made the operator less 'the goat' of the trade than he was before you championed his cause. You have improved his knowledge and condition as no other. And say, Brother, we all want to see what you look like. Please put your picture in the Projection Department, and oblige all of us."

I should like to have used your name, Milwaukee, for the reason that you should have the credit for such an excellent letter. If you will look back through the department for the past year or so, you will find that I have said a great many times that the condenser should be so spaced that the two convex surfaces almost touch each other at the point of the convex. Whether you are right or not as to this being a universal panacea for the "ghost" trouble, I would not like to say. I must, however, correct you as to one statement: if the lamphouse is pulled back, it would have a tendency to make the spot at the cooling plate slightly smaller, and instead of pulling the lamp back from the condensers as you say, it would naturally be moved slightly nearer to them, thus making the spread of the light rays, after passing through the first lens, more, instead of less. I will not comment on this matter at length, but pass it on for the consideration of our readers. As to the lens matter, there is considerable in what you say, but it would require, in most cases, condensers of very long focal length. This would in turn mean that the arc would be at an excessive distance from the condensers, thus involving a very large loss of light. You see there are so many equations entering into this kind of thing that one is apt to give undue prominence to one point, without considering the effect it will have on other things. Here is where your theory strikes a snag: suppose you have a stereo lens of 21 inches e. f. Do you realize that the source of light must be a distance from the condenser greater than its e. f. before the rays will begin to converge? This would mean that, according to your theory, with a 21 inch e. f. stereo lens your arc must be more than 21 inches from the condenser—how much light would you get? Now don't feel bad because you have overlooked this portion of the matter. It is much better to study and fall into a slight error than to not study at all. An error can be corrected easily, but ignorance can only be corrected by study. I would like to go deeply into this matter with you, but the M. D. man has ordered me to indulge in no mental exertion which can possibly be avoided for two or three weeks. I've been overdoing matters in the work line somewhat and must rest. If I don't he says I may take a long, long rest—so I guess I'd better mind this time. As regards the editor's photograph: it has been published in these columns However, we have many new readers and, as yours is but one of a large number of similar requests, I shall take pleasure in introducing myself to you photographically before long. The M. P. World staff appears in Pathe's Weekly No. 17, at the funeral of J. P. Chalmers, our late lamented editor The first two gentlemen in the procession are W. Stephen Bush and Mr Jas. L. Hoff; the next two are Mr Hugh F. Hoffman and myself; I appearing at the right.

A PATHE MACHINE. Corning, Cal., writes: "Am using a Pathe professional machine, and must say it has stood up well. However, I notice a great deal of jump in the pictures, particularly the Selig, whenever I want to speed up to give a scene some action. Have gone over the tension springs, put in a new gate and film tracks; also new upper and lower sprockets. Will appreciate any suggestion you can offer. I for one am very much interested in your new book, which you mentioned last week. You can put me down for one."

The upper and lower sprocket would have nothing to do with the picture jumping. If the teeth of the intermittent sprocket are worn, that might cause the trouble. You say you have gone over the tension springs. Now, just exactly what do you mean by that? Perhaps the tension is not sufficient. When your picture begins to jump, grasp the lower half of the upper loop lightly between the first two fingers of your left hand, and apply a little pressure. If this stops the jumping, it is almost certain that you have not sufficient tension. I do not remember how the tension is increased on the Pathe machine. As I recollect the matter, however, it is done by bending inward two springs which press against the tension shoe. I suppose I need not caution you to keep the face of your sprockets scrupulously clean. Dirt on the film or the face of the intermittent sprocket will cause film to jump, and a jump from this cause would be present at any speed. I am inclined to think that the trouble will be found either in a worn intermittent sprocket, worn sprocket shaft bushings (or the shaft itself being worn, which would amount to the same thing) or too little tension. Many thanks for the compliments you paid the editor. I have endeavored to allow my name or my recommendation to be attached to nothing that I could not personally vouch for. The book will, I believe, be one that will make you all sit up and take notice when it is finished.

MACHINE GRINDS.—Wisconsin (name of town suppressed by request) writes: "Why does my Edison Underwriter's Model, Type B, Edison machine grind? There seems to be a grind in it some place, though it is not permanent. Sometimes it will be present during a whole reel, and then will not be heard during the projection of the next two or three reels Again the grinding may be heard once in the evening. If I run the machine very slow or very fast I lose the grind. When the grind is present the machine runs much harder than at other times; also the flag on the automatic shutter wobbles, and is not steady. It does not affect the picture Outside of this, everything is O. K."

Could not make out name of your theater You did not send any other street address Supply that and I think the trouble can be fixed up It is probably due to an old style shutter. Send me the number of the machine also.

VALUABLE REPORT Mr. Robert W. Kiewert, president and general manager of the Charles L. Kiewert Company, manufacturers of high candlepower arc lamps, Milwaukee, Wis., writes as follows: "I have for some time been following the reports you publish under 'Projection Department' concerning the soaking of carbons in salt brine. While I at first did not believe such a stunt possible, because ordinarily a carbon, if it contracts the least bit of moisture, becomes unfit for use, I must confess, however, that my curiosity has been sufficiently aroused, that I have submitted the sum and substance of the different articles, which appeared lately on this subject, to Mr. Viertel, technical director of Gebrueder Siemens & Company's carbon factory in Berlin, a man who is regarded an authority and an expert in his line, he being the inventor of the cored carbon. I have asked him for his opinion and shall be glad to send you his reply in due time. It occurred to me, however, that my letter to him to-day ought to be supplemented by another one enclosing Mr. George T. Gregory's original communication, which I believe you published February 10th. This particular number has apparently been destroyed, so I would thank you to supply me with another copy."

We are glad to know that men of such standing as Mr. Kiewert are watching the Department, and following up the various experiments therein suggested. The report from Mr. Viertel will certainly be of great interest, and we cordially thank Mr. Kiewert for having request it. The desired copy of the World will be forwarded immediately.

JACK CONWAY.

Jack Conway, whose likeness is above shown, graduated from high school plays to afterward join the Morgan Stock Company, Rock Island, Ill. He then toured the South with Ed. Bailey in repertoire as juvenile man. On his return, the Morgan Stock Company claimed him, and he was featured leading man. A few of his greatest successes were: "Sir Richard Cato," in "Case of Rebellious Susan;" "Checkers," in the play of that name; "Lieutenant Denton," in "Arizona," and "Sherlock Holmes." Later, he toured the Middle West as "Lancelot," in "Merely Mary Ann." He created a furore at the Pacific Coast as "Frank Fuller," in "Mrs. Temple's Telegram," which success led to his engagement with the Bison Motion Picture Co., whose leading man he was for more than a year and a half. He afterwards joined the Selig Co., and for six months was a leading support of that company. David Horsley, who knows a good actor when he sees one, saw Jack Conway, and that is why this versatile young man has been appearing in Nestor pictures for the past few months. Mr. Conway is leading man with the Western company of Nestor players, and is as popular in the studio as he is on the screen. His exceedingly pleasing personality and his ready adaptation to any part assigned to him, make him a valuable asset. He takes a great interest in his work and it is partly due to his enthusiasm that the recent Nestor Westerns have been even more worth-while than they ever were. Besides being an accomplished actor, Mr. Conway is a thorough gentleman and has a smile that never comes off.

"The Death Ship."

A Sensational Two-Reel Drama of the Sea, Containing One of the Most Thrilling Dynamite Explosions Imaginable.

THE World's Best Film Company is about to market a thrilling sea drama, as a two-reel, state rights, feature picture that is going to cause a lot of talk and incidentally make beholders gasp in its more sensational parts.

There is one scene in particular that will be remembered by all who see it as long as they live. It is the actual dynamiting of a very tall stone lighthouse. This is one of the most extraordinarily realistic scenes that has been done in motion pictures for a long time, and if any are desirous of knowing about the action and power of dynamite, they should surely see this picture.

There are other scenes in the picture which if not quite so thrilling are just as interesting. There are some boat scenes that will be considered beautiful from an artistic point of view, and are of the kind that will cause a deep yearning in the hearts of boat lovers who are obliged to live ashore and lead sordid business lives.

Another interesting feature of the picture is a storm at sea and the sinking of the "Aurora"; an actual shipwreck in which a large vessel goes to the bottom. Incidental to this are scenes showing the work of the life-saving crews along the shore, and the removal of sailors from the foundering vessel.

Interwoven with these realistic scenes is a story that has a direct bearing upon them. The plot revolves upon the financial difficulties of a vessel owner. It is further complicated by his son being in love with the daughter of the captain of the "Aurora," which vessel is owned by the young man's father. The ship owner desires his son to marry a wealthy widow, in order to avert a financial crisis, but the son has already obligated himself, which puts that matter practically out of the question. The father's only resort lies in forgery, which he hopes to cover and make good before it can come to light. In this action he makes a mistake, as the forgery very soon becomes known, and he is confronted by the banking authorities. At this point the son proves his loyalty to the family name by confessing himself to be the forger and assuming the responsibility. The young man is found guilty, upon his own confession.

Shortly after the young man is put into prison his father in desperation decides to send his vessel, the "Aurora," on a voyage, and while en route to have it sunk in order that he may collect the insurance money. The captain, however, refuses to sail with the vessel on account of its unseaworthy condition, and resigns his position. The vessel owner then goes along the wharf and engages an unscrupulous sailor to captain the craft, agreeing to give him 20 per cent. of the insurance money.

The convict son of the vessel owner just about this time is granted a conditional pardon, the terms being that he leave the country for two years. Following out this arrangement he signs as first mate to the "Aurora," his father's own vessel. From this point there are many interesting nautical scenes. After some days the captain, being drunk, falls down a companionway, and sustains fatal injuries. He is buried at sea. This incident automatically makes the first mate the commander of the vessel. As the vessel starts on the return journey, news is telegraphed to the vessel owner of the death of the captain. This means to him a miscarriage of his plans. Being in desperate straits he is determined not to be thwarted by anything. On the night that the vessel is due home, a terrific storm is raging. The vessel owner, excusing himself from a soiree at his home, hurries off to the shore and employs a crooked character to place a stick of dynamite in the lighthouse to the purpose that his own vessel be wrecked, being unaware that his own son is in command of the ship. The stick of dynamite is placed in the lighthouse and in a few moments we see one of the most realistic pieces of dynamite destruction that has come to public notice, either in moving pictures or otherwise.

The vessel is wrecked in the storm. The alarm goes through the town and the life-saving crew gets into action. A great sea is rolling, and, altogether, the pictures at this point are decidedly well worth looking at. The ship owner learns that the lighthouse and vessel are wrecked, but he also learns that his son is on the sinking vessel. This news is more than he can bear, and he becomes a suicide without waiting to learn whether or not his son has perished. But the son is rescued and returned home safely, where his name is soon cleared of the charge of forgery. Very soon after he marries the captain's daughter.

Coming at this particular time when shipwrecks are a vital topic, "The Death Ship" will no doubt be received with more than usual interest. It has nothing in common with the sinking of the "Titanic," but on account of the great calamity to the White Star Line vessel, the appearance of this picture is more opportune.

"PRINCE CHARMING" (Reliance).

Many film manufacturers are lax in their duty toward the children. But Reliance is not one of that number. Every once in a while the producer should stop turning out ponderous dramas and devote a reel to the kiddies. This should be done regularly. Children have done much for the moving picture and the producer should not forget what they have done, but give them a reward. A children's picture is never a risk from a business standpoint, because it is a very safe rule that what pleases the children will please the old folks. The stock excuse for adults when they go to a circus is that they go to take the children, but they enjoy themselves just as much as do the children.

"Prince Charming" is a great "kid" picture, made especially for that purpose, and probably will be a very big hit as such. The story was written by Mr. George W. Terwilliger and was produced by James Kirkwood. These two gentlemen are a good combination and they have put over some telling work during the past few months. Dividing honors with them, however, is little Edna Foster, better known in the Reliance pictures as "Little Billy," a character she has played a number of times. In this picture she plays the part of a newsboy who lives alone in a great city. Her work is very skillful and would be charming with or without the "prince" part of it.

Scene from "Prince Charming" (Reliance).

The story tells of a newsboy who gazed wistfully at the children of the rich as they played together in Central Park. He wondered why nice children never made friends with him, but he had no grudge against the world on that account. One little girl seemed to him like a good fairy. Her face was so sweet and her ways so good that he gave her his all. By great good fortune she dropped her pair of gloves and that gave him an opportunity to speak to her, for he picked them up and went timidly to her to return them. The little girl was pleased with him and insisted that her governess reward Billy by purchasing for him a bag of cakes.

Being spoken to by such a little queen was enough joy for any one day and Billy repaired to his garret lodgings with a bag full of cakes and a heart full of joy. He fell asleep while eating them and dreamed a wondrous dream.

He dreamed that a resplendent footman came with royal robes for him, and a royal summons to appear before the Fairy Princess. He put on the royal velvet and gold robes and appeared before the Princess who was none other than the little girl he had met that afternoon in the park. He appeared before the court among a large throng of royal children, but he was the favorite, singled out above the others. He was treated royally. Never had he received such kindness in his life and never before had he enjoyed himself so well. Too bad that such a dream should end, but, of course, it did, and poor Billy awoke to find himself on his humble cot once more. It was only a dream, but it didn't cost anything, and it was just as good as going to the theater. So Billy went out to sell his papers, happy in the knowledge of what might have been, even if it never was or never would be. Good stuff.

"THE LITTLE NUGGET" (Nestor).

There is a touching little Western drama released this week by the Nestor Film Co., entitled "The Little Nugget." Mr. Jack Conway plays the character of the tempted miner in this story and he does exceptionally well in this part. Miss Eugenia Forde depicts the character of the miner's wife, and credit is also due her for her splendid portrayal of this difficult part.
